Social worker back to work despite charges

MITCH WEISS Associated Press

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP) – A North Carolina social worker accused of failing to take action on complaints that could have saved a 15-month-old girl's life has returned to her job even though she's still facing criminal charges in the case.

Candice Lassiter, 28, returned to her job June 11. She was charged in February with three counts each of obstruction of justice and forgery related to the investigation of Aubrey Kina-Marie Littlejohn's death.

Lassiter answered a call at the Swain County Department of Social Services office in Bryson City last week, but declined to discuss the circumstances surrounding her return.

"I just can't talk about it," she Repeated telephone messages left for the agency's interim director, Jerry Smith, were not immediately returned. DSS board members refused to comment, referring all calls to DSS attorney Justin Green.

Green confirmed that Lassiter returned after an agency investigation. But he said by law he couldn't disclose details about the investigation or why officials allowed her to return while her case is pending.

Littlejohn's great-aunt, Ruth McCoy, has repeatedly pushed for justice in the case along with the little girl's mother, Jasmine Littlejohn.

McCoy, a realty officer for the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs who works in a building that also houses several DSS officials, said she discovered that Lassiter

Leaders revive Inter-Tribal Council of Five Civilized Tribes

NORMAN, Okla. – When the Inter-Tribal Council of the Five Civilized Tribes (ITCFCT) met at the Riverwind Casino on June 7-8, its leaders were breathing life back into a group that had been defunct for six years. Although it had a storied name, ITCFCT had mostly remained quiet during the postgaming boom in the Sooner State.

With the election of new leaders in two of the five tribes, the idea to revitalize the organization took hold. Leaders from the Muscogee (Creek) Nation, Chickasaw Nation, Seminole Nation, Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma and the Cherokee Nation gathered with their top thinkers to hash out their positions on issues like education, elders, enrollment and repatriation, among others.

Nearly a dozen work groups brainstormed during the two-day session, which was followed up by a two-hour general session opened to the public. About 130 tribal citizens, officials and employees from the five tribes attended to listen to mini stateof-the-nation addresses from their five respective leaders.

Back when ITCFCT met on a regular basis, the five tribes were concentrating on gaming expansion within their jurisdictions. It was a casino bonanza then-- only a few of the member tribes had opened their flagship casinos. In 2004, their individual economic development followed the approval of state-tribal gaming compacts. Since then, the tribes are more in a position to focus on common interests rather than solely managing their respective gaming empires.

And while gaming is a vehicle for tribal development, Seminole Nation principal chief, Leonard Harjo, told attendees that diversifying gaming funds means keeping one eye on the future while doing business in the present.

"We know that gaming might not be with us forever," Harjo said. "We need to invest in our people."

Organizers said the gathering of what is referred to as the Five Civilized Tribes (a federal designation for the group) can once again be a steering mechanism for Oklahoma's other tribes. Member tribes contend that what affects the eastern Oklahoma tribes sets the tone for similar issues that other tribes are facing, said Muscogee-Creek Nation member and spokesman, Edwin Marshall.

"The other tribes are waiting for us to take the lead," he said.

Issues like state sovereignty were a recurrent theme. Murky are water rights, with two of the tribes (Chickasaw and Choctaw) engaged in a federal dispute with the state of Oklahoma over the transport of water to municipalities that the plaintiffs say are a violation of a 19th Century treaty. The case remains in federal court.

Choctaw Nation second chief, Gary Batton, made note of the strong tie between sovereignty and water during his address. He filled in for Choctaw chief, Greg Pyle, who did not attend because of illness. Batton said the Choctaw Nation seal bore both the peace pipe and tomahawk, which

Fraud alleged at acclaimed American Indian school

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP)

– A nationally recognized charter school organization in California could face a criminal investigation after a state audit found evidence of financial fraud, conflicts of interest and other illegal activities.

The report released June 13 detailed allegations of unscrupulous activity at Oakland-based American Indian Model Schools, which operates three public schools whose standardized test scores are among the state's highest.

The audit was conducted by state Fiscal Crisis & Management Assistance Team at the request of Alameda County Superintendent Sheila Jordan. She said she would forward the report to the Alameda County District Attorney's office.

Jordan urged Oakland Unified School District officials to Descendants of the Sioux and Cheyenne warriors who defeated Lt. Col. George A. Custer and his 7th Cavalry gathered June 11 at Deer Medicine Rocks to celebrate the sacred site's new status as a National Historic Landmark.

Sioux, Cheyenne celebrate new historic landmark

LORNA THACKERAY

The Billings Gazette

LAME DEER, Mont. (AP) – For 1,000 years or more, Native peoples have etched their histories and prophecies on the sandstone faces of Deer Medicine Rocks near what is now Lame Deer.

Barely visible bighorn sheep, warriors on horseback and a grizzly bear roam the soft, sheer faces of the rock outcrop just off the Northern Cheyenne Reservation.

And on an early June day 136 years ago, a Sioux artist carved a vision that had come to Hunkpapa medicine man Sitting Bull after a torturous Sundance ceremony. In the dream, soldiers with "grasshopper" legs fell from the sky into the Indian camp. The soldiers had no ears.

This vision is believed to have foretold victory at Little Bighorn about three weeks later on June 25, 1876.

On Monday, June 11, descendants of the Sioux and Cheyenne warriors who defeated Lt. Col. George A. Custer and his 7th Cavalry gathered at Deer Medicine Rocks to celebrate the sacred site's new status as a National Historic Landmark.

David Harrington, acting superintendent at nearby Little Bighorn Battlefield National Monument, told about 200 people gathered for the ceremony that Deer Medicine Rocks' new status ranked it beside the Alamo, Mount Vernon and the Empire State Building as one of the nation's most important historic sites.

"Only 2,500 sites are so honored," he said. "That seems like a lot, but there are 87,000 sites on the historic site list. It is one of only 3 percent so honored."

Feds trying to dismiss lawsuit on artifacts raid

PAUL FOYAssociated Press

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) – Federal agents drove a Utah doctor to suicide after interrogating him and searching his house for an ancient artifact they never found, his family's lawyers argued Thursday in a wrongful-death case against the government.

The U.S. Justice Department asked U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart to throw out the lawsuit, saying federal agencies were protected by immunity in the most sweeping investigation into the trafficking of American Indian artifacts allegedly taken from federal and tribal lands. In 2009, federal agents swept up 26 defendants in Utah, Colorado and New Mexico.

Dr. James Redd, 60, killed himself a day after his arrest by rigging a garden hose from his tailpipe to his Jeep. His family says he never dealt in artifacts, but he was charged together with his wife and a daughter. Months later, Jeanne and Jericca Redd were sentenced to probation on trafficking charges.

At issue Thursday was the work of a government operative who was given more than $335,000 to make deals with people later accused of digging, selling and collecting artifacts from federal and tribal lands.

Lawyers for the Redd family argued that federal agents coached the informant – grocery chain CEO-turned-artifacts dealer Dan Gardiner – to offer more money than any artifact was worth to make offenses a felony instead of misdemeanor. The Redds were accused of acquiring a bird effigy pendant in a trade with Gardiner for another set of artifacts.

Family lawyers argued the pendant wasn't worth $1,000 – making the transaction a felony – and that the government was never able to identify the pendant from 812 boxes of confiscated artifacts from the Redd's house in Blanding, Utah. They also said the government couldn't find the artifacts Jeanne Redd traded for the pendant.

The family is asserting the government agents manufactured evidence, used excessive force, abused their powers and illegal confiscated the family's personal belongings. They're demanding the government return family photos, Dr. Redd's personal diary, banking records, a telephone, three digital cameras and other items.

"They took everything in the house except for furniture and clothes," said Shandor Badaruddin, a lawyer from Missoula, Mont, who represents Mrs. Redd and five daughters.

Justice Department lawyer Deepthy Kishore argued that market values for artifacts were slippery, federal agents couldn't be blamed for offering too much and that the government is immune from lawsuits over tactics used in an investigation.

U.S. law allows federal agents to hold onto even irrelevant evidence seized in an investigation, she said.

Dr. Redd wasn't harmed when he was arrested and handcuffed, and the government can't be held responsible for his suicide, she said.

The government argues that the Redds can't cite a single instance when their constitutional rights were violated during the raid.

After his death, according to the lawsuit, a BLM agent told Jeanne Redd and her daughter that Dr. Redd "took one for the team" by killing himself.

Carlie Christensen, the No. 2 prosecutor at the U.S. Attorney's office in Salt Lake City, said she was unfamiliar with that allegation and couldn't respond.

Tribes alarmed by IRS audits

SUZANNE GAMBOA
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – John Yellowbird Steele, chief of the Ogalala Sioux Tribe, said the Internal Revenue Service is failing to recognize tribal sovereignty by trying to tax government-funded assistance such as housing, school clothes and burial aid that tribes give their members.

Speaking to a Senate panel Thursday, Steele invoked the treaties between the U.S. and his South Dakota tribe as he criticized the IRS for what seems to be a stepped-up effort to tax tribal assistance.

"We fix houses, and they want us to put a value on how much that lumber cost to patch a hole in a roof or a floor, put shingling on, they want us to put a value on that and give the person a 1099" tax form to possibly be taxed on the help, Steele said. "The next year, where are those people going to find the money to pay the IRS?"

The IRS over the years has narrowed its tax exemptions for federally, state and locally funded social benefits for tribe members so that only those with significant financial need do not have to pay taxes on the benefits, tribal leaders said.

The agency has been meeting with tribes to develop and clarify rules on what is taxable under the General Welfare Doctrine, which governs whether the assistance tribal members receive should be counted as income and be taxed. But as the meetings have gone on, tribes are getting notices that they are being audited, Steele said.

Steele said the tribal assistance helps members raise their living standard and in some cases survive. He accused the IRS of launching a fishing expedition, saying his tribe has been asked to provide documentation on payments to employees, council and tribal members; petty cash and bank records; health care benefits to tribal members and employees, and powwow prizes, among other things.

"The IRS violates our treaties when it seeks to tax the basic government services that our tribal government provides our citizens," Steele said in written testimony.

Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, who chairs the committee, said providing for tribal members is "truly critical to the self-determination of tribal governments."

The IRS has been reviewing per capita payments that tribes make to citizens from trust money raised through tribal businesses.

Athena Sanchey Yallup, executive secretary of the Confederated Tribes and Bands of the Yakima Nation in Washington State, said the IRS has been seeking to tax her nation's distribution of earnings from the timber on its land to each of its 10,400 tribal members for the first time in its history. The IRS' taxation of the trust payments is a "radical change in policy," she said.

All of this comes as the Obama administration has won accolades from Native American tribes and Alaska Natives for recognizing their sovereignty and requiring federal agencies to do a better job of explaining changes in policy or adoption of new policies. IRS officials said many of the concerns have been raised as the agency has been meeting with tribes to develop guidance on the exemptions.

The IRS defended its work with tribes. Deputy Assistant Secretary Aaron Klein described meetings on the issue and has been gathering comments and recommendations on what can be taxed as income. Klein said the discussions show that additional guidance is needed, as well as clarification of rules governing when such benefits can be taxed.

Christine Jacobs, director of the Office of Indian Tribal Governments at the IRS, said the exemption for social welfare benefits is not in the federal tax code but is an administrative exemption. She said to be excluded from taxes, benefits and payments must be made under a governmental program, promote the general welfare and not represent compensation for services.

public trust," Jordan wrote in a letter to Oakland Unified Superintendent Tony Smith.

American Indian Model Schools founder, Ben Chavis, Lumbee, did not immediately respond to a request for comment. Other staff members said they were not authorized to comment.

The final report followed a preliminary report that found evidence of possible fraud by Chavis, his wife Marsh Amador and their businesses, which provide services to the three schools.

Despite that preliminary report's findings, the Oakland school board in April voted 4-3 to keep open American Indian Public Charter School II after backers argued that closing it would hurt students at a school with near-perfect test scores.

The final report detailed $3.7 million in questionable payments to businesses owned by Chavis and his wife, including money for rent, storage fees, construction projects and the administration of summer school programs.

The report also documents more than $25,000 in unauthorized creditcard purchases, serious lapses in board oversight as well as violations of conflict of interest laws, open meetings laws and federal grant requirements.

Regulators bow out of tribal electric dispute

■ The tribal council's sovereign authority over reservation land trumps the commission's regulatory jurisdiction.

DALE WETZELAssociated Press

BISMARCK, N.D. (AP)

- North Dakota regulators concluded earlier this month that they lack authority to intervene in a dispute about which of two utilities will supply electricity to a tribal casino on the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation.

The Public Service Commission's decision may have broader impact on the state's four other American Indian reservations, the commissioners said. All have tribal casinos and other tribally owned businesses.

The decision allows Fergus Falls, Minn.-based Otter Tail Power Co. to build the needed electric supply network to serve the Turtle Mountain tribe's Sky Dancer casino and hotel, even though the North Central Electric Cooperative already provides power to the casino. The cooperative is based in Bottineau.

Commission chairman Tony Clark said the Turtle Mountain tribe's governing council has the power to choose which utility will provide electricity to a tribal business located on tribally owned land.

Normally, the PSC has some authority to stop construction of duplicative electric networks, to prevent wasteful spending and an unnecessary burden on utility ratepayers. However, the tribal council's sovereign authority over reservation land trumps the commission's regulatory jurisdiction, Clark said.

The council was within its rights, Clark said, but he added that the situation could result in a "poor public policy outcome."

"As a general rule, do we want, in North Dakota, double sets of lines running to businesses (and) utilities overbuilding each other?" Clark asked. "There cannot only be wasteful duplication of service, but there can really be utility shopping, in a way that doesn't take place ... anywhere else in the country."

Even in deregulated states where electric customers can choose from among power providers, those utilities do not have permission to duplicate each other's energy supply networks, Clark said.

Debra Hoffarth, a Minot attorney for the Bottineau utility, said she would discuss with cooperative officials whether they wanted to appeal the PSC's decision. Commissioner Kevin Cramer said he anticipated an appeal.

Otter Tail spokeswoman Stephanie Hoff said the utility expects to become the casino complex's electric supplier next week. The tribe has signed a 10-year contract, and it is not being given a special rate, she said.

Otter Tail already serves some large reservation customers, including the tribe's community college, while North Central has been the casino's electric provider since it was built.

Otter Tail serves Jamestown, Wahpeton, Devils Lake and a number of rural communities in eastern North Dakota. North Central serves five counties in north-central North Dakota, including Rolette County, where the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa reservation is located.

The commission's ruling was limited to the Otter Tail-North Central dispute, Clark said. However, its logic could apply to any tribal business located on property owned by the tribe, such as a proposed oil refinery that the Three Affiliated Tribes is planning to build near Makoti, about 30 miles southwest of Minot.

The refinery, if constructed, would be a major electric customer. It is designed to process western North Dakota crude into gasoline, diesel fuel and propane.

The Otter Tail-North Central argument arose because the Turtle Mountain tribe is expanding its Sky Dancer casino and hotel, adding about 100 motel rooms, space for about 200 additional slot machines and a recreational vehicle park.

The project is adding new casino space and converting the existing casino into a restaurant and convention hall. Its grand opening is scheduled for November. The complex is located about four miles west of Belcourt.

US Attorney meets with Oglala Sioux about deaths

KRISTI EATON Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) -Three attorneys from the U.S. Attorney's Office in South Dakota have been assigned to review the case files of nearly 40 deaths dating back to the 1970s on or near the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, the U.S. Attorney for South Dakota said Wednesday.

The announcement by U.S. Attorney Brendan Johnson came at a forum with Oglala Siouxtriballeadersatameeting in Kyle on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. Johnson was meeting with the tribal leaders and family members of tribal members who asked that he reopen investigations and prosecutions into the deaths of 39 people.

"You can always put a new set of eyes on it," Johnson said by phone afterward.

But he also said it will be challenging to find new evidence for cases going back 40 years in some cases. He said he does not want to get anyone's hopes up that unresolved cases might be solved or prosecuted, but hopes that with more attention focused on the cases, more people may come forward with new evidence or leads. He referred to the case of American Indian Movement activist Annie Mae Aquash as an example. Aquash's 1975 killing went unsolved for decades until Fritz Arlo Looking Cloud was convicted of first-degree murder in 2004 in federal court. John Graham was convicted in state court

The June 13 meeting offered a chance for Johnson to meet with family members of those who died, said Jennifer Baker, a Colorado-based attorney working with the Oglala Sioux tribe on the issue of unresolved deaths.

"It was more of a stepping stone ... so (Johnson) can put some faces with names," she Baker said several family members of the 39 people were in attendance. Other people came forward with additional names of cases that should be reviewed, Baker said.

Oglala Sioux Vice President Tom Poor Bear and council judiciary committee chairman James Toby Big Boy have led the effort to review the cases. The men wrote a letter to Johnson earlier this year asking that the U.S. Attorney reopen the cases. Last month, the two provided a list of 39 cases that they feel have gone unsolved or not sufficiently prosecuted.

While the majority of the cases are from the 1970s when the murder rate on Pine Ridge was the highest in the nation - there are three cases from the 1990s, including the deaths of Poor Bear's brother, Wilson Black Elk, and cousin, Ron Hard Heart. Their bodies were found in 1999 on reservation land just across the border from Whiteclay, Neb.

"I really feel that U.S. Attorney Brendan Johnson came with a sincere heart and a concern about these uninvestigated deaths," Poor Bear said, adding that the families simply want closure. "It gave them hope that one day they will find closure."

Decisions loom on tribal water rights settlement

FELICIA FONSECA Associated Press

FLAGSTAFF, Ariz. (AP) - Navajo and Hopi lawmakers are soon expected to decide the fate of a water rights settlement that could end years of litigation or send the tribes back to court.

The settlement recognizes the rights of the tribes to groundwater within the Little Colorado River basin and gives the Navajo Nation nearly three-fourths of surface water from the river. The tribes would waive further claims to the river system in exchange for groundwater delivery projects paid for by the federal government.

U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., has introduced legislation to approve the settlement, but it won't move forward without the blessing d give on a settlempponents argue that its lawmakers don't have the authority to make decisions on water rights for the 12 villages, which are considered autonomous. Gearon, a member of the Navajo Nation, said she acknowledges that while litigation might not result in any more water for the tribes that they are getting through the settlement, it would be worth a fight in court.

Another opponent, Marshall Johnson,

"We are for a settlement agreement that honors our historical roots that predate American laws and allow for true input from the Navajo people," he said.

represented the Choctaws' willingness to negotiate but also their wiliness to defend its own.

"We believe it's our water and our rights to that water belong to us," he said.

Meanwhile, the American Indian Cultural Center in Oklahoma City could also benefit from their united advocacy, officials said. The beleaguered facility has hit a funding stumbling block to subsidize the high-tech museum. Additionally, the five tribes have suggestions for the Bureau of Indian Affairs' search for a new Eastern Regional director, officials said.

The goal of the newly gathered ITCFCT is to scout direction before it begins drafting jointly endorsed resolutions, officials said. What may start out as internal ideas could mean external solutions to help with situations that affect both state and tribes for the good, they said.

Cherokee principal chief, Bill John Baker, said the new year bodes good tidings from Cherokee Country. With a new leader decided in his jurisdiction, input should be productive and peaceful from all five sides.

"People believed they were making a difference in Indian Country when they were working in these groups," Baker said. "We can do it faster, we can do it better."

In their reinvigorated stance, Muscogee (Creek) Principal Chief Nation George Tiger serves as chairman of the Executive Committee with Cherokee Nation principal chief Baker as vice-chairman. Executive Committee members are Chickasaw Nation Gov., Bill Anoatubby, Choctaw Nation chief, Greg Pyle and Seminole Nation Principal Chief Harjo.

The inter-tribal organization was founded in 1950 and is the oldest such tribal organization in the United States. The five tribes' council is made of four the most populous of 562 federally recognized tribes with nearly 625,000 enrolled citizens, ITCFCT officials said. Together, their economic impact exceeds $1 billion dollars.

Tribe quiet as ND voters scrap Fighting Sioux name

JAMES MacPHERSON and DAVE KOLPACK

Associated Press

STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATION, N.D. (AP) – As North Dakota residents resoundingly decided to scrap their flagship university's Fighting Sioux nickname, the response was far murkier in Sioux County – home to a tribe that had gone decades without staking a clear position on the divisive question.

Voters statewide turned out in numbers not seen in a primary election for more than five decades, according to unofficial results, yet most members of the Standing Rock tribe took a pass. Sioux County, where much of the reservation is based, voted 184-159 to retire the University of North Dakota's nickname and Indian head logo.

That represented just 8 percent of county residents, 84 percent of whom are American Indians.

"By and large most people either don't care or support the name," Lyle Antelope, a member of the Standing Rock Sioux Indian Reservation, said Wednesday.

The issue, which has divided the state for decades, boiled over seven years ago when UND was placed on a list of schools with American Indian nicknames that the NCAA deemed hostile and abusive. Those colleges were told to dump the names or risk sanctions against their athletic teams

Some schools quickly removed their American Indian-themed nicknames and others, such as Florida State, survived the NCAA edict by securing the approval of namesake tribes.

There was no such consensus in North Dakota. The Spirit Lake tribe approved the nickname in 2010, but the other tribeStanding Rock – never took a vote. That's why last week's election was being closely watched in Sioux County as the first – and possibly only – opportunity for members of that tribe to speak in unison.

Walter Twinn, 69, who still speaks his native Dakota language, said there are only a handful of people on the reservation strongly opposed to the name. He cited a 1969 pipe ceremony held on the UND campus when a delegation from Standing Rock and at least one representative from Spirit Lake reportedly bestowed to the university permanent rights to use the nickname.

"UND has helped a lot of Indian students," Twinn said. "It should stay."

The Standing Rock reservation straddles the North and South Dakota border and is home to about 9,000 people, more than half of whom live in North Dakota. Elections for tribal chairman typically draw up to 2,000 voters.

Lawrence Miller, an employee at the tribe's casino, said it makes little sense to change the name. However, he acknowledges that he didn't vote.

"What are they going to call themselves, the Holsteins? Or the Cow Milkers?" Miller said.

Bubba Standing Bear, who spent June 12 herding cows on horseback, said he would have approved the measure had he been old enough to vote.

"To me it really doesn't matter. It's just a name," he said. "I didn't think it was disrespectful. I know a lot of the old people might not like it but I think it is respectful."

Erich Longie, an enrolled citizen of the Spirit Lake tribe who has been an outspoken critic against the nickname, said UND T-shirts and other giveaways encouraged about two-thirds of 1,100 members of that tribe to endorse the name in 2009. He said only 70 people on the Spirit Lake reservation voted that Tuesday.

"They didn't have all the free stuff to pass out," Longie said. "It shows you how much people cared about the vote."

The state Board of Higher Education is expected to vote at its meeting in Fargo on whether to direct UND to resume efforts to retire the nickname. The board in February told UND to resume using the moniker after petitions were approved for last week's ballot measure.

Even if it does push the school to retire the name, the saga may not be over. A group is collecting signatures for another ballot measure – possibly as early as November – that would make the Fighting Sioux name an official part of the state constitution.

Tim O'Keefe, the UND Alumni Association and Foundation executive vice president and CEO, expressed hope in a statement Wednesday that the nickname backers would honor the election results and let the rebuilding begin.

"Too many relationships have been tested by the debate, and we now need to come together to advance the tremendous growth and potential of UND as a worldclass institution," O'Keefe said.

Kolpack reported from Fargo,

THE HISTORY:

The University of North Dakota debuted the "Sioux" part of its nickname more than 80 years ago. UND's student newspaper on Oct. 3, 1930, hyped the change with a front-page headline reading: "Sioux' replaces 'Flickertail' as Captain of University Sports Teams." Flickertail, the previous nickname, referred to a type of ground gopher. Apparently, school officials decided the rodent didn't instill appropriate fear in opponents.

BUT WHY "SIOUX"?

Before the Dakotas became states, they were part of the Sioux Nation. As gold helped push the population farther west, UND was founded in 1883 in the Dakotas Territory. (North Dakota became a state six years later.) The term Sioux isn't without its own history - it's part of an Ojibwa-French pejorative term meaning "snakes" but in 1930 it was accepted as a nod to the area's Native American history. In a 1969 pipe ceremony on the UND campus, some representatives from the Standing Rock and Spirit Lake tribes reportedly gave the university permanent rights to use the nickname.

AND "FIGHTING"?

That part didn't come along until the 1960s, under longtime Athletic Information Director Lee Bohnet, who died in 1999. Patricia Bohnet, his daughter, wrote in May 2011 that she didn't know how her father would feel about the school losing its nickname, but she knew he would "be on the side of the student athletes."

LANDMARK

Rocks certified as a landmark took years. Northern Cheyenne and Lakota Sioux worked with the Park Service to designate the rocks based on their relationship to the Great Sioux War of 1876-1877.

Harrington said there are three other national landmark sites associated with the Great Sioux War – Little Bighorn Battlefield, Rosebud Battlefield and Wolf Mountain Battlefield – all within 35 miles of the newly designated Deer Medicine Rocks Landmark.

"The three previous sites were killing sites, battlefields," Harrington said. "This is a cultural and historic site for the tribes and the only one that tells the story from a Native American perspective."

The site is on a ranch owned by the Jack and Carol Bailey. The property has been worked by the Bailey family since the early 1880s. Northern Cheyenne and Sioux officials thanked them for preserving the rocks and for allowing tribal members to fast, smoke and pray at one of their most sacred sites.

Bruce Wittenberg, director of the Montana Historical Society, announced that later this year, Jack Bailey will be honored as one of Montana's "Heritage Keepers."

During the two-hour proceedings, visitors gathered above Rosebud Creek as it meandered through the picturesque country of red-tinted hills. In the time of Sitting Bull, camps of Lakota and Cheyenne stretched for three to four miles along the creek, said Steve Brady Jr. of the Northern Cheyenne.

Sitting Bull, leader of the largest coalition of warriors ever gathered on the Northern Plains, was drawn to Deer Medicine Rocks by a vision, said Philip Whiteman of the Oglala Lakota.

"He came to the Cheyenne and asked where the rock was he saw in his vision," said the cultural leader from the Pine Ridge Reservation in South

"In his vision he saw a whirlwind with this blue lightning strike and these petroglyphs," he said.

A lightning strike on the rocks did leave a long, blue scar that bisected the image of a deer. The image is thought to be where the rocks got their name.

Not long after Sitting Bull's Sundance, Custer's troops traveled through on their way to the Little Bighorn. Custer and his Arikara scouts saw images left in the camp and on the rocks. The scouts grew uneasy, understanding that the Sioux and Cheyenne believed that they would win a great victory.

Whiteman said that through all the oppression of Native peoples since the time of the reservations, Sitting Bull's vision for his people propelled them forward.

"We are going to be leaders and teachers once again," he said. "Our ancestors spoke of this time – a cleansing."

Phyllis Young, a Hunkpapa who sits on the Standing Rock Reservation Council, said "America is ready for us. America is ready for our old ways."

WORKER

had returned to work when she picked up a copy of a DSS newsletter from a table in the hallway.

"Social Worker Candice Lassiter will return to work today in the Adult and Children Services Unit," the newsletter announcement says. "We all welcome her back to the Agency."

McCoy said Aubrey's family is outraged.

"That was like a slap in the face to the family," she said. "Aubrey is already gone. She will never return and then they bring this woman who was involved in her death back to work in front of us? It's wrong."

This the latest is development in a case that has stunned and polarized western North Carolina, and sparked anger in the Native American community. Aubrey was a member of the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians, some of whom claim that the Swain County DSS did not do enough to protect Aubrey and other Native American children. Part of the Cherokees' sprawling reservation lies in Swain County.

Another great-aunt of Aubrey, Ladybird Powell, was arrested and charged with second-degree murder in January – a year after the toddler's death. Powell had begun taking care of Aubrey shortly before Jasmine Littlejohn reported to jail in April 2010 to await trial in a marijuana-trafficking case. Littlejohn was in jail when her daughter died.

An Associated Press investigation found that police and social workers had been aware of reports Aubrey was being mistreated while she was staying with Powell.

McCoy alleges Lassiter was one of the social workers whom police escorted to Powell's home on the night of Nov. 9, 2010 to investigate a complaint that an 11-year-old boy was living in a trailer with drugs and no heat.

They removed the boy, placing him in McCoy's custody, but let Aubrey stay. The heat was off because the power bill wasn't paid.

"I begged her (Lassiter) to take Aubrey, but she wouldn't listen," McCoy said.

The girl died Jan. 10, 2011, after Powell rushed her to the emergency room. When Swain County investigators looked into the case, they discovered the agency had at least three reports of neglect or abuse regarding Aubrey.

Investigators later found pages missing from written reports on the case.

Prosecutors say that after Aubrey's death, Lassiter ordered a subordinate, Craig Smith, to falsify records to make it appear that the department had done a thorough job investigating allegations that Aubrey was being abused.

Smith, also charged with obstruction of justice, resigned from the agency last year. Lassiter and three other DSS workers were suspended with pay. Tammy Cagle, the agency's director at the time, was fired for what county officials said were unrelated reasons.

David Wijewickrama, a lawyer representing Aubrey's estate, has filed two lawsuits in connection with her death, at least one of which names the county DSS as a defendant along with Lassiter and six other current and former social workers.

The lawsuit asks for more than $10,000 in damages, and accuses Swain County of not doing enough to protect Native American children.

That has resonated with the Cherokees. McCoy said they have formed a committee, of which she is a member, to create a Cherokee-run DSS system for the reservation.

"We need to make a change for our children's safety," she said.

them that. Fifty percent (50%) of Indian students drop out of high school. I often wonder if the racist attitudes of school people will ever change. It has not in my lifetime, which is almost three-quarters of a century now.

It seems to me that counselors have three different functionscounseling, discipline, and career preparation. The first two take so much time that they only once in a while get to the third one. Counselors who have to deal with absenteeism, students who have been suspended for bad behavior, and the like-all the negative things—are in the wrong position to help students prepare for college or vocational school, the positive outcomes.

Only 17% of Indian students go on to college from high school. And since 50% of these high school students drop out before graduation, only 8.5% of Indian students enter college. This compares to 70% nationally. Thus Indian enrollment in college is only 12% of non-Indian enrollment. And 82% of these Indian college students drop out before they graduate from college; they never earn a degree. For every Indian college graduate per unit of population, there are 30 nonyears, not smaller.

A few of them never came back when they went home to Iowa or South Carolina for Christmas. Out of 168 teachers that I interviewed on the four campuses (Chemawa, Stewart, Sherman, and Phoenix), no more than 30 were career people with BIA schools.

The same thing happened when I was at Bacone College. At least two of the new faculty went home from Oklahoma to New Jersey or Pennsylvania for Christmas, and we never heard from them again. We had to hire new people in the middle of the year.

A handful of colleges report low dropout rates for Indians, ranging from 10% to 25%; they are mostly Ivy League colleges with high admissions criteria. Among them are Harvard, Stanford, and Yale. But most colleges have dropout rates of 60% to 90% for Indians.

One of the best studies of the Indian dropout ever done was at the University of New Mexico. Dr. Ted Jojola and his wife Dr. Delia Alcantar found that the cumulative dropout rate after 20 semesters—ten years—

They on the Indian dropout for decades, I suspect some of them will attack me on this report as well. I have been attacked by the best cover-uppers. Very few people want to face the truth; even fewer want to do anything

One of the biggest frustrations we face at Catching the Dream is people wanting to apply for Indian scholarships. Once we explain to them that there are only eight such Indian scholarships with any real money (we draw the line at giving away $20,000 or more a year), some of them get frustrated and give up. We tell them FastWeb, the most comprehensive scholarship site, now has 1.5 million entries in its database. Some of them act as if they don't want to hear that.

It's like they feel they should get some of the mythical Indian money at the end of the rainbow, even if they are not enrolled in a tribe and can't prove they are Indian. Getting Indian money is part of their Indian heritage, or what they think is their heritage.

A few of them give us the same kind of story that Elizabeth Warren gave a few weeks ago—that her as a low-end cook in a restaurant in Dr. Ardy Bowker at Montana State grandmother had high cheekbones, Albuquerque.

Some of them tell us they are descendants of two or ever three tribes, and they want us to tell them which tribe they should enroll in. They get frustrated when we tell them we couldn't possibly know, from the scant information they have given us, what tribe to look for. If they tell us they are Cherokees from Illinois, we are really stumped, since the Cherokees are either from North Carolina or Oklahoma. If they tell us the tribe, we are glad to tell them how to contact their tribal enrollment office.

We love to hear of the success stories, though. Isaiah Rodriguez (Laguna) came to see me in January of 2008. He had been a high school dropout from the ages of 16 to 21. But one day he woke up and said, "Is that all there is?" He was working

I spent two hours with Isaiah, been getting larger over the past 40 of research on the Indian dropout 20 racist and stereotypical that her showing him how to find years ago. > We do all we can to open the eyes of the Indian students to the real world of scholarships. But it is like an ant trying to push an elephant. We mail to the high school counselors every year, and have for over 20 years. But it does little good. At this point, out of 1,080 counselors at Indian high schools, we have gotten contact in the past two years with exactly 16 people.

> My theory is that there is a huge elephant out there started by Capt. Richard Henry Pratt at Carlisle in 1878. It's called assimilation, meaning Indians should learn English, how to make beds and plow fields, and not much else. Not much has changed. College is not for them.

Osage Casino completes renovation, hosting grand re-opening this week

CHRIS BARTONOsage Casino

SAND SPRINGS, Okla. – Guests will enjoy improved air quality, a new cafe and an expanded gaming area at our newly renovated Osage Casino – Sand Springs. Our new bar area is among only a few bars currently open in Sand Springs, and the only bar in town that offers multiple high-definition TVs for all types of sports fans. A larger dance floor and performance stage allow guests to take in exciting shows every weekend.

"We have made Osage Casino – Sand Springs a more enjoyable gaming experience by upgrading everything and most importantly, making the air quality much better inside the Casino," said Osage Casino General Manager, Byron Bighorse. "We appreciate the patience and support of our guests during this process."

Osage Casino – Sand Springs opened in the summer of 2004 as an enterprise of the Osage Nation. In September 2011, construction firm, Osage Manhattan Builders, worked on the new construction focused on air quality. Using energy conversion technology, our new air ventilation system ensures that inside air is circulated outside after installing new renewable energy technology.

"A successful part of this renovation period is that we've been able to remain open 24/7 and accommodate our guests throughout the process," Bighorse said.

Osage Casino – Sand Springs features a new colorful light fixture with varying multicolored light displays, new carpet and a totally new interior.

New Features

A total of 462 new Electronic Games have been added. A VIP area called Crystal Lounge has also been added for our toplevel players.

In addition to dozens of new Electronic Games, the Casino installed 16 big screen TVs throughout nearly 24,000 square feet of space, including a new High Stakes gaming room and four Table Games for Blackjack and Ultimate Hold 'Em Poker.

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

The Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma's newspaper, Biskinik, has joined the ranks of other outstanding tribal programs and ventures and has been recognized for its efforts with eight awards from the Oklahoma Press Association Better Newspaper Contest.

OPA held an awards presentation program June 8 at the Reed Center in Midwest City as part of its three-day annual convention. The contest drew 937 entries from 98 newspapers and was judged by members of the Nevada Press Association. The top winners in each of the 10 divisions took home the Sequoyah Award, 120 first place plaques were presented during the banquet and newspapers receiving second, third or fourth place received certificates.

The Biskinik competed in Division 8, which is for Sustaining Memberships. First place awards were received for In-Depth Enterprise, a continuing series of history/culture columns provided by the Choctaw Nation Cultural Services department; Editorial Comment; and Community Leadership for the informative manner water rights issues are presented to keep readers upto-date. Other awards included two third places – News Writing and Sales Promotion. The Biskinik entered its pages of Labor Day information and brochure in the Sales Promotion event. The Biskinik also placed fourth in Sports Coverage for stickball and Labor Day tournaments, Advertising and Personal Columns by Chief Gregory E. Pyle and Assistant Chief Gary Batton.

The Choctaw Nation's newspaper is mailed to more than 80,000 tribal members every month. Its name aptly reflects the legend of the Choctaws' "little news bird." Biskinik would live around Choctaw homes and let them know when someone was approaching, tapping out messages on trees. The small, watchful yellow-bellied sapsucker would also accompany hunting or war parties.

The Biskinik strives to continue keeping the Choctaw members abreast of current events, beneficial information on healthy lifestyles, opportunities to improve education, program benefits and news from Choctaws around the world to share with others. Its office is located in the tribal headquarters in Durant with five staff – Editor Lisa Reed, Assistant Editor Larissa Copeland, Reporter/Production Assistants Bret Moss and Chrissy Dill and Purchasing Coordinator Karen Jacob. The Biskinik is a division of the Public Relations Department under Executive Director

Press releases and on-the-spot news are also posted to the Choctaw Nation's Facebook page and in the News Room on the Choctaw Nation's website, www. choctawnation.com.

New technology has provided many opportunities to provide digital communication and another way for Biskinik to spread the news.

Congratulations not only to the Biskinik, but also to the Osage News and the Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribal Tribune.

The Osage News won six awards in the Sustaining Division, including first for Personal Column writing. They took home second for In-Depth Enterprise; third for Layout & Design, Feature Writing and Photography; and fourth for News Content.

The Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribune placed second in Feature Writing.

Downstream Casino Resort building 2nd hotel, spa

SEAN HARRISON Downstream Casino

QUAPAW, Okla. – With the opening of a second hotel and other new amenities later this year Downstream Casino Resort will add at least 40 new permanent jobs. Meanwhile the project has created 400 construction jobs this year, giving a boost to the Tri-State Region's economy.

A $50 million investment, the 152-room addition with an upscale spa and indoor pool, is currently under construction and is expected to open toward the end of 2012.

With this Phase II expansion, the Downstream Development Authority's total investment in the resort property rises to $361 million. Phase I, a casino with five restaurants and a 222-room hotel that opened in 2008, cost $301 million. The Authority has added about $10 million in other construction and improvements over the past four years.

"We are excited today to show you what we're doing next," said John L. Berrey, Chairman of the Quapaw Tribe and the Downstream Development Authority, speaking at a grand opening event for Downstream's new Q Store and RV Park on the Missouri side of the property, which added 20 new jobs.

"We are very fortunate to have such strong relations with our communities, and to have their support," he said. "Even through a long and difficult recession we have done very well, and it is our hope we can continue to help build and share in a strengthening regional economy."

The new hotel will be a showcase of luxury and highend amenities designed to enhance the overall attraction of Downstream and expand its primary market reach beyond the current 100-mile radius.

Downstream had outgrown its current 222-room hotel more than a year ago. But also with the addition of an elegant spa, an indoor pool and other new amenities, the expansion takes aim at raising the bar for destination resorts in this part of the country. The new hotel will feature 18 suites including two enormous, finely appointed Hospitality Suites with special features and capabilities.

"We already have a firstclass hotel with first-class service. So with the addition of another hotel and these very nice amenities we will be offering even more," said General Manager Steven Drewes. "Our guests definitely have something special to look forward to."

The expansion will also include a new location for the Buffalo Grille, with a private dining room and an outdoor dining area.

Officials say Downstream has outgrown its current 222-room hotel. A second hotel and other new amenities are scheduled to open later this year.

Society of Professional Journalists honors Native cartoonist Marty Two Bulls

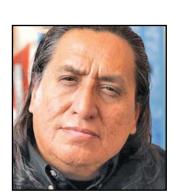

JESSE ABERNATHY Native Sun News

RAPID CITY, S.D. – "Our enemies call us the Sioux."

This is the intriguing guiding mantra of talented Oglala Lakota artist Marty Two Bulls Sr., as emblazoned on the home page of his recently relaunched commercial design website, m2bulls.com.

In April, the intrepid Two Bulls was presented with the prestigious Sigma Delta Chi award from the Society of Professional Journalists for his nationally renowned editorial cartoons. He specifically won in category "Editorial Cartooning (Newspaper Circulation 1-100,000, Regional Magazine, Non-Daily Publication or Online Independent)."

Two Bulls is currently the editorial cartoonist for Indian Country Today Media Network, a New York Citybased weekly newsmagazine that has been owned and Nation since 1998.

Such recognition is no small feat in a world in which Native American journalists – particularly editorial cartoonists – are few and far between in comparison to non-Native American journalists. But through the hard work, dedication and professionalism of individuals like Two Bulls, that fact of life is steadily becoming a thing of the Originally hailing from the Red Shirt Table community on the Pine Ridge Reservation, Two Bulls initially got his start as a serious political cartoonist from Native American journalist and Native Sun News founder Tim Giago in the 1980s at the original Lakota Times. He also worked for Giago after the newspaper changed its name from the Lakota Times to Indian Country Today in 1992.

Two Bulls has a strong connection to his people as evidenced by his sharpwitted, carefully nuanced political cartoons with their highly relevant and highly contemporized themes of Native America. The cartoons that secured him the Society of Professional Journalists award addressed television journalist Diane Sawyer's visit to Pine Ridge last year for ABC's "20/20," the shooting death of Native American woodcarver John T. Williams at the hands of a Seattle police officer in August 2010, the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, and the Occupy Wall Street movement.

The nationally recognized artist with the distinctive style has enjoyed a long career in the commercial design sector including television, print technologies, daily newspapers and newer media forms, serving as graphic editor for South Dakota's two largest daily newspapers, the Rapid City Journal and the Sioux Falls Argus Leader.

Two Bulls, whose father is The Rev. Robert Two Bulls and grandfather was Peter Two Bulls, graduated last month with a bachelor of fine arts degree from the Institute of American Indian Arts in Santa Fe, N.M, where he now makes his home.

Possible new tax law raises questions for tribes

change to federal tax laws concerning per capita payments has tribes around the country sitting up and taking notice.

The Internal Revenue Service has been meeting with tribes to establish and clarify rules on what is taxable under the General Welfare Doctrine, which governs whether the assistance tribal citizens receive should be counted as income and be taxed.

per capita payments have found themselves subject to federal audits YAKAMA, Wash. - A potential this year, with the IRS inquiring whether proper tax forms were sent do is an extraordinary, overreaching out to citizens.

> Among the tribes under scrutiny is the Confederated Tribes and Bands of the Yakama Nation, headquartered in Toppenish, Wash. The 10,400-citizen tribe distributes a per capita payment from income generated by trust resources on its 1.4 million-acre secretary of the tribe's legislative the government in the form of a tax."

However, several tribes that offer branch, Athena Sanchey Yallup, on Indian Affairs.

"What the IRS is now attempting to action that is contrary to the express intent of this Congress and the promises of the Treaty of 1855," she said. "We would never have ceded away nearly all of our aboriginal land had we understood that we would eventually be asked to give onethird of the modest earnings from reservation. On June 14, the executive reservation natural resources back to testified before the Senate Committee of the Oglala Sioux, shared Sanchey Yallup's concerns about the IRS' perceived disrespect for tribal sovereignty.

> "One of my tribal presidents told me an IRS person showed up at his reservation," Steele said. "He told him (the IRS agent) he had a treaty. He (the IRS agent) told him he could read it in prison."

Tribes that distribute per capita checks from non-trust revenue sources are also monitoring the situation.

Heather Payne, a spokeswoman

John Yellow Bird Steele, president for the Red Rock, Okla.-based Otoe-Missouria tribe, said via e-mail that her tribe provides a per capita payment for its members from its gaming revenue and is still working on interpreting the ruling.

> "We are still trying to figure out if tribal assistance like elder assistance, housing repairs, school clothes...would be taxed under their interpretation," Payne wrote. "It seems like that is what they are saying if the revenue comes from trust funds."

Tribes work for record Native vote

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP)- The head of the largest group representing Native Americans and Alaska Natives said federal and state governments should provide voter registration at Indian Health Service facilities.

Jefferson Keel, president of the National Congress of American Indians, said in a phone interview Tuesday with The Associated Press that the health facilities should be designated voter registration sites in the same way statebased public assistance agencies are under the National Voter Registration Act. He said the facilities are ideal for voter registration because they're in many tribal communities.

"Not all Native Americans are registered, and that's one of the things we are pushing for this year is to turn out the largest Native vote in history,"

Indian Health Service spokeswoman Dianne Dawson, reached late Tuesday evening, said the agency had no comment at this time.

Only three of every five American Indians and Alaska Natives who were eligible to vote in 2008 were registered, Keel told a gathering of tribal leaders Monday at the opening of the midyear meeting of the National Congress of American Indians in Lincoln, Neb. He said an estimated 1 million Native Americans and Alaska Natives who are eligible to vote are not registered.

"This should be considered a civic emergency," Keel said.

Keel said the voter registration and turnout work is not intended to be partisan, but American Indians have made significant gains under the current administration and tribes want to protect their resources and sovereignty.

"Many of these politicians believe the Indian bloc is so small, the number of Indian voters is so small, and it's of no significance," Keel said. "But it's not so small if they look at the resources Indian Country has," including natural gas, coal and minerals.

In addition, better turnout of Native Americans can make a difference in state elections where many issues affecting tribes also are decided, he

Judge rules in Cheyenne & Arapaho frozen funds case

NATIVE TIMES STAFF REPORT

CONCHO, Okla. — A Custer County judge assumed authority June 21 over the bank account for two Oklahoma tribes grappling with an extended leadership dispute.

Citing a 2008 Oklahoma case as precedent, district judge Doug Haught ruled last Thursday that although his court does not have the authority to settle the ongoing question of whether Janice Prairie Chief-Boswell or Leslie Harjo is the legitimate governor of the Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes, it does have the authority to intercede on behalf of a non-tribal bank that is home to most of the Cheyenne and Arapaho's money without violating the tribes' sovereignty. "Tribal court is not general jurisdiction," Haught wrote in his decision. "I believe this court has jurisdiction over this account because this is a statechartered bank and its accounts are governed by state law."

The First Bank and Trust Company in Clinton, Okla., filed a petition in Custer County district court after receiving conflicting information as to who had signatory authority over the tribes' account. The tribes' bank accounts were frozen on April 24 after attempts to reach a compromise were unsuccessful.

Under the terms of last week's ruling, the bank is forbidden to disburse any funds to either tribal government unless ordered by the court. Officials from either government attempting to withdraw funds must contact the court and the other government in writing before any removals are allowed.

"To do anything other than convert this account to a courtsupervised account would be tantamount to deciding which of the rival tribal governments legitimate," Haught

'Let's Move in Indian Country' hits year mark, despite funding hurdles

KASHENA, Wis. - At the Save-A-Lot on Warrington Road, a savvy Menominee shopper can get carrots, tomatoes or lettuce on the store's "10 for $10" promotion. The choices are loaded with meaning because the bargain food chain is the first grocery store in nine years that tribal citizens have had in their midst, said Menominee council member, Bruce Pecore.

Economic The Menominee Authority Development Board approved the purchase of the $1.6 million store with tribal funds, partially gaming derived, to help erase a persistent food desert—a geographic area defined as having no access to healthy foods. Here on the treefilled Wisconsin reservation, the Let's Move! in Indian Country program germinated.

Families in the 8,860-citizen tribe knew they were not getting their money's worth for food which was mostly processed and nutritionally unsound, according to the tribal councilor. For the Menominee, a simple questionnaire hit home.

"We looked at a study that showed our kids circled frozen pizza and bags of chips, you know, convenience food that they were eating," he said. "The grocery store allows them to get healthy food they need without having to drive to get it."

At its one-year anniversary mark, the national Lets Move! in Indian Country movement is unfunded by federal monies and buttressed mostly by a multi-pronged media campaign through the Department of Interior (DOI). Officials are pushing the

WASHINGTON

- The Supreme Court says the government must fully reimburse Native American tribes for money they spent on federal programs.

The federal government had agreed to fully reimburse money tribes spent on programs like law enforcement, environmental protection and agricultural assistance, but Congress capped the amount of money earmarked for that reimbursement. The tribes sued, and the 10th U.S.

Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver said the money must be fully reimbursed.

The high court on June 18 said the Ramah Navajo Chapter and other Native American tribes must get their money back.

Feds announce 1st major solar plant on tribal land

MICHELLE RINDELS Associated Press

LAS VEGAS (AP) – Federal officials have approved a solar plant on an Indian reservation outside Las Vegas, marking the nation's first commercial-grade solar energy project on tribal land and new territory for the Obama administration's renewable energy agenda.

U.S. Interior Secretary Ken Salazar said Thursday that he signed off on a plan with the Moapa Band of Paiute Indians that will launch a 350-megawatt solar plant capable of powering 100,000 homes.

"We do not want Indian country to be left behind as we move forward with the new energy front in the United States," Salazar said in a conference call with reporters.

The project, proposed by K Road Moapa Solar LLC, is planned on 2,000 acres of the tribe's reservation. It will connect to and help power the Moapa Travel Plaza, a truck stop near the entrance of Valley of Fire State Park, which provides much of the small tribe's income.

Officials plan to break ground this fall, and estimate the project will create 400 jobs at the peak of construction. They estimate between 15 and 20 of those jobs would be permanent.

"Everyone is extremely excited and hopeful and jazzed about the future of this project," said tribal administrator Yvette Chevalier. "This project creates both financial and educational opportunities for the Moapa Band of Paiutes."

The tribal initiative is part of a broader Interior Department effort to bring solar, wind and geothermal projects to public lands. It also marks the 31st utility-scale project approved on public lands since Obama took office in 2009.

Officials said the department is also working to revamp federal surface leasing regulations in an effort to streamline energy project development on tribal lands.

"Indian country has a wealth of resources," said Donald "Del" Laverdure, the acting assistant secretary of Indian affairs. He said the initiative ensures "tribal governments can also participate in the American dream."

Gillette honored during Title IX anniversary

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) – Sports have always played a big part of Jodi Gillette's life.

Her first memories are of watching her mother play shortstop in fast-pitch softball. As a child, she would watch her dad as he coached a high school basketball team and cross country.

Gillette, an enrolled member of the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe in North Dakota and South Dakota, said her parents pushed her to excel in both academics and sports. The same drive that led Gillette to play basketball at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire has led her to the White House, where she advises President Obama on policy issues affecting Native

"I found that the work ethic and discipline involved in developing athletic talents translate very well into academic and workplace settings," Gillette said in an email.

On Thursday, Gillette will be recognized in Washington with 39 other women who have been named to the Women's Sports Foundation's 40 For 40 list. The list honors women who have made a significant impact on society after playing sports in high school or college during the 40 years Title IX has been enacted. Title IX is a law known mainly for mandating gender equity in high school and collegiate sports.

Jodi Gillett

Other honorees include soccer player Mia Hamm, figure skater Michelle Kwan, comedian Ellen DeGeneres and astronaut Sally Ride

"We are proud to recognize these women and the positive role that the passage of Title IX has played in the lives of countless women and girls," Kathryn Olson, chief executive officer of the Women's Sports Foundation, said in a statement. "Each has used participation in sports as a step toward making a very significant contribution to society in a wide variety of fields."

Gillette said she hopes the award will provide greater understanding and visibility for Native American women athletes and professionals, as well as inspire Native youth.

"I would like youth to see that consistent hard work pays off not only on the court, but can also build character and confidence to achieve in other areas," she said.

Hope is theme of Pine Ridge reservation campaign

KRISTI EATON
Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) – A campaign on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation to raise awareness about the high rate of suicide among the reservation's youth is reminding them what all of them can have – hope.

The rate of suicide on the reservation is at least 150 percent higher than the national average. In 2009, the Oglala Sioux Tribe declared a state of emergency because of state of suicides on the reservation, which also has high rates of unemployment, violence and alcoholism.

As part of the Lakota Voice Project, organizers gave about 200 disposable cameras to elementary and middle school students on the reservation, who were told to document what hope means to them.

"We really didn't give the students any instructions, no limitations. We didn't control it. Basically, the only question we gave them was, 'What does hope look like to you?" said Jason Alley with the American Advertising Federation of the Black Hills, which been working with students from a business class at Oglala Lakota College to develop the awareness campaign.

The college students came up with the topic of suicide awareness on their own after a brainstorming session, said Karissa Eifert, also with the American Advertising Federation of the Black Hills.

"Within 20 minutes, the students had decided suicide prevention for youth was the most important thing that needed to happen," she said. "We learned that every single student in the class had been affected by suicide. Whether it be a close family member or friend, or they had those challenges themselves, every single person on the reservation has been impacted in some way. It's a huge problem."

The ultimate goal of the campaign is to obtain funding for a crisis team on the reservation and a suicide hotline. The current local hotline for reservation residents runs only until 5 p.m., at which point residents must call a national number.

Alley said the photos the students took are powerful in their simplicity and execution. Hope for many of the young people meant family, friends and sports.

"When you look at these photos, a lot of them are really common things. There are pets and family and friends and elders. When you think about it, those are the little things that a lot of us disregard," Alley said. "I think this will allow even elders and community members at large to embrace this idea of the positive and the hope and the beauty that can be found as well."

The 1,000 photos will be on display Friday at Little Wound Elementary School in Kyle. Legislators and tribal officials have been invited. Billboards and other marketing materials with the photos will also be distributed in the future, and organizers hope to create a traveling exhibit.

Fed probe launched into school closures

GALLUP, N.M. (AP) – A federal agency is investigating the closure of three New Mexico schools to see if the troubled Gallup McKinley County School District violated federal civil rights laws.

The Gallup Independent reports that the Office of Civil Rights of the U.S. Department of Education notified parent Sonlatsa Jim-Martin last week that the agency had received her complaint against the school district and would investigate.

Jim-Martin is part of a group of parents and Navajo Nation officials who believe the district made a wrong decision in closing the middle schools in Crownpoint, Tohatchi and Navajo to make up for a projected $2.5 million shortfall.

In her letter to the civil rights office, Jim-Martin alleged that the decision to close the county schools and not take any action against schools in Gallup proper amounted to discrimination against Navajo students.

Erica Austin, chief regional attorney for the civil rights office, said her office is willing to look into the matter to see if any discrimination occurred.

"These closures/consolidations are alleged to be discriminatory to Native American students in that it treats Native American students differently than white students," she wrote in her letter to Jim-Martin.

Austin also pointed out that Jim-Martin's complaint accused the district of failure to inform the Navajo parents who would be affected by this decision in advance, which is a violation of Title VI laws.

"Because we have jurisdiction and the complaint was filed in a timely manner, we are opening these allegations for investigation," Austin said.

She pointed out, however, that agreeing to look into these allegations doesn't mean that the civil rights office agrees that discrimination occurred.

Superintendent Ray Arsenault said he's not worried about the investigation because the school district was not discriminating against anyone.

He said it made a decision based on the fact that the schools in question were underused and district officials felt it was more important to keep the district programs funded over saving a school that was less than 33 percent utilized.

Fed official wants Spirit Lake problems addressed

FARGO, N.D. (AP) – A federal human services official is urging sweeping steps to address problems with social services and foster care administration that he says are endangering children on the Spirit Lake Indian Reservation in North Dakota.

Thomas Sullivan, regional administrator in Denver for the U.S. Administration for Children and Families, advocates suspending all state and federal funding to the tribe until qualified professionals are put in place to run programs to ensure that children are not subjected to physical, sexual and emotional abuse, The Forum newspaper reported. One instance Sullivan cites is the unprosecuted killing of two siblings about a year ago.

"The children of the Spirit Lake Reservation are being subjected to actual abuse or the threat of such abuse due to the actions and inactions of adults who have responsibility to protect them from such abuse," Sullivan wrote in a recent email to state and federal officials.

He said tribal leaders have failed by "firing professional, qualified staff, directing their replacements to ignore reports of abuse and neglect, refusing to prosecute the most egregious cases of abuse, even the murder of children, by demonizing those who speak out on behalf of these children and then claiming piously, 'Our children are sacred,' while all look the other way."

Tribal Chairman Roger Yankton

has cited staff turnover, high caseloads and inadequate federal funding for problems, and says the safety of children is a priority for the State officials say they have limited jurisdiction but have acted where they can, including suspending some funding and monitoring 36 Spirit Lake foster children or children pending adoption.

"Where they have authority, they're exercising that authority," said Jeff Zent, a spokesman for Gov. Jack Dalrymple, referring to the North Dakota Department of Human Services.

Scott Davis, executive director of the North Dakota Indian Affairs Commission, said he met with Spirit Lake officials in mid-February and believes they are moving to correct problems.

"I know there's been unrest there for some time," Davis said.

A state review team inspected the tribe's foster care case files in January after it became aware of deficiencies flagged in a yearly review of the tribe's social services programs by the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs.

U.S. Attorney Timothy Purdon said he is proud of his office's record in prosecuting violence as well as criminal child abuse and neglect at Spirit Lake and other reservations. He said the alleged homicide of the brother and sister who were found dead in May 2011 "is a priority for me and my office, and it has been since the date of the incident."

Head of Bureau of Indian Education resigning

WASHINGTON (AP) – The director of the Bureau of Indian Education is resigning to take a position in his home state of South Dakota.

Secretary of the Interior Ken Salazar announced last week that Keith Moore is leaving the BIE to serve as state director for the Fellowship of Christian Athletes in South Dakota.

Moore, an enrolled member of the Rosebud Sioux Tribe in South Dakota, has led the Bureau for the past two years. He was selected for the position by then-Assistant Secretary of Indian Affairs Larry Echo Hawk.

BIE Chief of Staff Brian Drapeaux will serve as acting director until a replacement is named.

The BIE operates the federal school system for Native American students. It oversees more than 180 facilities on 64 reservations in 23 states.

Lawmakers address reservation crime

Officers commonly misidentified bundles of sage and other plants that Indians sometimes carry.

BEN NEARY Associated Pres

ETHETE, Wyo. (AP) - A federal crackdown on crime over the past two years has improved the quality of life on the Wind River Indian Reservation in central Wyoming, but sustained effort, funding and coordination are necessary to hold the gains, officials told state lawmakers on Tuesday.

Sprawling over 2.2 million acres in central Wyoming, the Wind River reservation is home to both the Northern Arapaho and Eastern Shoshone tribes. It's the only reservation in the state, and has seen more than its share of horrific crimes over the years.

Speaking at a criminal sentencing in Cheyenne early last year, a federal judge said something had to happen to snap the cycle of excessive drinking leading to violent crimes, often among relatives, on the reservation.

"Somehow, this behavior has to change," U.S. District Judge Alan B. Johnson said in March 2011 when he sentenced a young Robert Spoonhunter to 13 years in prison.

Spoonhunter had pleaded guilty to voluntary manslaughter in the death of his sister, 13-year-old Marisa Spoonhunter, of Ethete. According to authorities, after a night of drinking in a trailer on the reservation, Robert Spoonhunter choked his sister and threw her into a weight bench, injuring her head, when he found another man having sexual contact with the girl.

Now authorities including U.S. Attorney Christopher "Kip" Crofts, whose office prosecuted Robert Spoonhunter, say they're seeing concrete changes.

"Things are better, there's no question about it," Crofts said Tuesday. He was among many federal, state and local officials who testified to a joint meeting of the judiciary and tribal relations committees of the Wyoming Legislature.

Crofts, who grew up near the reservation, said he believes continued federal support for law enforcement there is absolutely essential.

Wind River was one of four reservations nationwide that the federal government picked for a recent two-year law enforcement push that saw additional officers from agencies such as U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs and the U.S. Park Service stationed at the reservations. Marisa Spoonhunter was killed in April 2010, early in the federal effort. While the initial federal law enforcement push ended late last year, it gave the BIA breathing room to beef up its standing police force at the Wind River Agency from half a dozen officers a few years ago to 21 currently. Plans ultimately call for hiring for a force of 34 officers.

Reports of crime dropped on the other three reservations the federal government targeted during its 2010-11 Safe Indian Communities initiative. But reports of violent crime went up 7 percent on the Wind River Indian Reservation.

Crofts and others say reports of crime increased because residents discovered that if they called for help, they were likely to get it.

Will Matthews, chief of police for the Wind River Agency, testified to state lawmakers Tuesday that there's clearly been an improvement on the reservation. However, he said the early months of the federal law enforcement push were marked by residents' concern that officers were culturally insensitive.

Federal officers, who were brought in on short rotations from around the country, were unfamiliar with sweat lodges and other Indian ways, Matthews said. He said officers commonly misidentified bundles of sage and other plants that Indians sometimes

"Initially what we were running into was seeing bags of sage, and their presumption was that it's marijuana, and of course it's not," Matthews

Going from six officers to more than 30 during the surge, Matthews said an increase in crime reports was inevitable. "With having that many officers, we did see that initial spike in crime because it was being addressed," he said.

Rep. Patrick Goggles, D-Ethete, is the only American Indian in the Wyoming Legislature and lives on the reservation.

"There was some gap in cultural sensitivity," Goggles said of the federal officers who first arrived on the reservation. "But once we got past that part, and got people aware of certain things, it started to go a lot smoother."

Goggles said he appreciated the law enforcement surge as a local resident. "You started to feel a little bit safer in the community," he said.

Before the surge, Goggles said he commonly didn't drive on Sundays because it was so common to encounter drunken drivers on the reservation's roadways and it was nearly pointless to try to summon law enforcement help.

Gary Collins, tribal liaison between the Northern Arapaho Tribe and the state of Wyoming, also said he believes the federal effort has paid off.

"We've made a lot of progress in so many areas, we still have a lot of questions and problems, but they are so different than they were 20 years ago," Collins said.

The increase in law enforcement has resulted in a reduction in fatal car wrecks, Collins said. Officers are now arresting many drunken drivers before they have fatal accidents, he said.

"The cars are now being towed in, in one piece, whereas a couple of years ago, they were crumpled beer cans, they were horrendous car wrecks," Collins said.

Dispute over seized Native artifacts in talks

MATT BROWN

Associated Press

BILLINGS, Mont. (AP) - The government is entering settlement talks with the director of a Custer-themed Montana museum, trying to resolve who owns a cache of American Indian artifacts seized in raids by federal agents.

The 22 Indian war bonnets, medicine bundles and other items were confiscated in 2005 and 2008 from the Custer Battlefield Museum in Garryowen. The government spent years pursuing artifact fraud charges against museum director Christopher Kortlander, but dropped its investigation three years Kortlander, who says the items rightfully belong to the museum, will press his case Monday before U.S. Magistrate Judge Keith Strong in a settlement conference in Great Falls.

The U.S. Attorney's Office says most of the items have feathers from protected eagles, making them possible contraband. They have alleged some were stolen from members of the Crow Tribe.

But Kortlander has not been implicated in the thefts. And officials acknowledge one allegedly stolen war bonnet could have been misidentified.

Kortlander says federal officials from the U.S. Attorney's Office and Bureau of Land Management who are holding onto the artifacts are "trying to save face" for the years they spent on a fruitless investigation.

"They need to let it go," Kortlander said in an interview. "They're basically making up stories at this point. They won't concede anything."

In a recent hearing before U.S. District Judge Richard Cebull, Assistant U.S. Attorney Victoria Francis said the government did not have enough evidence to determine how the museum acquired the items. She said Kortlander previously had been unable to tell federal agents where they came from.

"When you say, 'I don't know whose they are,' that would indicate you're not the owner," she said. Francis added that a "museum should be able to say, That was donated to me by Mr. and Mrs. Smith."

Kortlander has since said he's found tax records or photographic documentation for most of the artifacts. He says any items determined to be stolen would be returned to their rightful owner.

Kortlander's museum is within the Crow Indian Reservation, just a few miles from where Lt. Col. George Armstrong Custer and more than 200 troopers and scouts from the Crow Tribe were killed in June 1876, by up to 1,800 Lakota Sioux and Northern Cheyenne warriors.

Thousands of items were seized during the 2005 and 2008 raids, which came after officials suspected Kortlander was fraudulently dealing in Little Bighorn battlefield artifacts and illegally buying and selling Indian artifacts.

After the government dropped its investigation in 2009, most of the items seized during the raids including 7th Cavalry and American Indian artifacts and thousands of pages of documents - were Among those items that weren't given back, government attorneys initially identified four stolen items: a feathered Crow war bonnet belonging to Larson Medicine Horse, a tribal member and former Big Horn County sheriff, and three medicine bundles belonging to Daniel Old Elk, the Crow Sun Chief.

Francis said a photograph supplied by Medicine Horse to prove his ownership turned out to be a picture of another war bonnet. But U.S. Attorney's Office spokeswoman Jessica Fehr said officials still haven't determined the owner of the seized item.

Leaders of the Crow Tribe say the rightful place for artifacts made by their people – regardless of how Kortlander got them – is with the tribe. Burton Pretty On Top, the tribe's cultural director, says the Crow, over the years, have lost many items to museums that have spiritual significance to their original owners and their families.

"I don't have any information on how (Kortlander) got those," Pretty On Top said. "In general we are concerned with any (medicine) bundles in possession of non-Indians. It belongs to the Indians, it belongs to the Crow - not for a museum's sake and to view and make money on."

Kortlander is not a member of the Crow.

Cebull said during the recent hearing that the case was entering uncertain legal territory, because typically it would be up to the government to prove it can continue to hold onto the museum's artifacts. Instead, it wants Kortlander to offer up proof even though he's never been charged with a crime.

"There's not going to be any criminal prosecutions," Cebull said before recommending mediation between the two sides. "We're plowing unplowed ground here."

Mesa dental-school graduates to serve tribal citizens

The Arizona Republic

PHOENIX (AP) girl on the New Mexico Zuni Reservation, Zellisha played doctor with her stuffed animals, bandaging up their fur and using a staticky television set as her X-ray machine.

But for years, the dream of becoming a health professional stopped at make-believe. "I guess I thought that becoming a doctor or dentist was too big of a dream for me. I mean, does that really happen on the reservation?" she said. "There was no one there that could be a mentor to me."

It wasn't until she met an American Indian dentist later that Quam starting considering the career path. On June 8, she became one of six American Indians to graduate from the Arizona School of Dentistry and Oral Health at A.T. Still University in Mesa.

The group of American Indians - defined in this case as enrolled members of federally recognized tribes - is believed to be the largest to graduate from any U.S. dental school at one time.

"I believe this is probably going to be a high-water mark for some time," said George Blue Spruce, he dental school's associate dean and Society of American Indian Dentists co-founder. "I could talk for hours on all the challenges that stop American Indians from making it into the health professions, all the way from lack of family support or tribal support to financial issues."

Saint Regis Mohawk and graduate Dariene Lazore agreed that reservation life isn't easy.

Kids there can "feel like they have no hope or future," she said.

That mindset, coupled with the fact that reservation residents can be nervous or hesitant about seeing non-Indian doctors, are reasons the school has reached out to prospective American Indian students all over the country, said dean Jack Dillenberg.

"Last year, there were only eight American Indian (dental-school) applicants in the U.S., and four came here," he said. "We know how important this is, and we're committed to not only recruiting but retaining these students."

In addition to encouraging participation in on-campus activities and groups, the school urges students to attend American Indian professional conferences so they can "rub elbows with people they aspire to be like" and stay motivated instead of feeling isolated, Blue Spruce said.

Students also can qualify for a scholarship in exchange for a postgraduate commitment to serving the American Indian community for a set period of time.

Though not everyone in the group participated in the scholarship program, all six graduates plan to work with Native populations, such as those on reservations or at clinics affiliated with the national Indian Health Service.

"I have four years to pay back, but I was already planning on working with the IHS," said Cheryle Singer, a Navajo from northeastern Arizona. Singer said she hopes to help eliminate language barriers and ease the anxiety some reservation residents feel at the dentist's office.

"A lot of times you hear back on the reservation things like, 'They send (non-American Indian) doctors out here just to practice on us," "Singer said. "And there are a lot of elderly people there who aren't bilingual, so being able to talk to them in their own language gives them a sense of comfort."

Quam hopes to show others it's possible to achieve what she has.

"If I had not seen my first Native American doctor, it wouldn't have catapulted me into this career," she said, "so I think it's important for younger generations to see a Native American dentist and hopefully get inspired to the

Reservation polling site has poor turnout

PINE RIDGE, S.D. (AP) - A polling site set up on South Dakota's Pine Ridge Indian Reservation following a federal voting rights lawsuit had poor voter turnout in the six weeks leading up to the primary, an election official says.

Only 46 people voted at the center, Fall River County Auditor Sue Ganje told the Rapid City Journal. With 31 days of actual voting, that meant fewer than two voters per "Obviously, we'd prefer it to be busier than it was," Ganje said. "We're hoping for much better this November, when the political parties get involved and start calling people."

The voting center in the town of Pine Ridge was set up after a group of 25 reservation residents filed a federal lawsuit seeking the same six weeks of early voting that were provided elsewhere in the state. Fall River County provides election services for Shannon County - which lies within the reservation - because Shannon does not have its own courthouse, and only six days of early voting initially had been planned.

The voting center in Pine Ridge was staffed by two employees from the Fall River County Auditor's Office in Hot Springs who made the 128-mile round trip daily, along with a language assistant who was available to help Lakota-speaking voters.

The two workers who traveled to Pine Ridge every day had other things to do while they were waiting for the next voter to show up, Ganje said.

"We were able to log into our computers out there, so thankfully we could do our work from there," she said.

The cost of operating the polling site is still being tabulated, Ganje said. Fall River County will bill Shannon County for the voting services. Shannon County then will bill the state, which has federal funding available, she said. State officials pledged the funding in response to the lawsuit.

without federal subsidizing, local efforts are the anti-obesity directive's main artery. In the various tribal communities, Let's Move style funding parcels in a mix of private groups, tribal gaming and non-profits monies. The motivation for Let's Move! is mounting. Statistics from the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA), relate that half of American Indian and Alaska Native (AI/AN) children are obese and are twice as likely to develop Type II diabetes than any other racial group.

One strategy on the tribal level focuses on taking the hassle out of getting healthy food. Because the nearest grocery store is 30 miles away, Santa Domingo is another of the food deserts dotted across Indian Country. Shoppers line up at the climate controlled trailer that rolls onto the reservation. Here fresh food is within reach, officials said.

Results for any anti-obesity and diabetes movement in Indian Country are long and short term, said Kristin Speakman, program manager at Johns Hopkins Center for American Indian Health. Already the USDA points out that 20 percent of children Indian from birth to two years in the nutritional Women Infants Children (WIC) program are obese. Speakman said short term goals are that Indian children will feel better and fare better if they eat nutritional foods. Over the long run, reducing national obesity rates will follow, but it takes time, she added.

unemployment and poverty rates among Indians, feeding the youth becomes tricky because federal food programs often don't meet the deficiency. Food allowances for these programs run out by mid-month, leaving Indian children hungry and parents more vulnerable to spending money on items that are not healthy.

At its one year mark, Let's Move! in Indian Country gets the ball rolling, officials said. They say technical assistance to start proven tribal initiatives would push members toward eating healthier where they may not try before. Until then, the tribes are forging their own healthier food paths, like the Kashena Save-A-Lot and the MoGro trucks.

"It's twofold," Pecore said. "I believe Let's Move! works if people try to do it themselves, but they may not have the money to start something up."

American Indians and Social Security

DAVE BALDRIDGE

Executive Director, International Association for Indigenous Aging

At Boston's original tea party in 1773, American patriots -symbolically dressed as Mohawk Indians -- dumped three shiploads of His Majesty's chamomile into Boston Harbor. They couldn't have known that more than two centuries later, another tea party would try to dump Social Security into Boston Harbor as well.

The Republican budget plan devised by Republican Rep. Paul Ryan, beloved by the Tea Party, proposes a draconian future for this landmark program that would hurt all older American and especially American Indians.

Indian elders have average annual incomes of just $2,063 -- about twothirds the amount of those for other American seniors. More than one of three Indian elders has severe disabilities and can no longer work.

[Last] week, the National Congress of American Indians voted unanimously for a resolution to support Social Security without cutting benefits for recipients. The tribal leaders represent most of the 3.4 million Americans who identify themselves with a tribe.

They met in Lincoln, Neb., where tribal leaders representing the nation's 566 American Indian and Alaska Native tribes met to discuss Indian Country issues.

It started when Indian elders from New Mexico's 19 Indian Pueblos got together last year to discuss Social Security. They were worried about the information, or lack of it, that they were getting. They agreed that they do not want the age of eligibility raised. They agreed that they do not want to see the Cost of Living Allowance cut. They do not trust the information they are getting from politicians. They are worried about losing the safety net for their grandchildren.

[The] resolution was adopted by the nation's tribal leaders, and has become the unified statement of Indian Country: "Don't cut Social Security benefits."

When compared with the total population of the United States, the American Indian and Alaska Native population has poorer health and higher poverty rates. It's not going to get better in the foreseeable future. In a new Centers for Disease Control and Prevention projection for health and income disparities in 2030, for these seniors will have lower levels of health and economic well-being than the aged population (62 and older) as a whole.

Many Indian elders may be accustomed to poverty. The median family income for American Indian and Alaska Natives is $44,347, as compared to $68,390 for non-Hispanic Whites.

They will be disabled -- seriously enough to prevent them from working, at more than 34 percent, 2.3 times the national average. Their per capita wealth will be about half that of the total senior population. And Social Security is the only safety net between them and disaster.

Most Indians, on the other hand, take a longer view of the social contract, perhaps best expressed in the Seventh Generation credo of the Iroquois Confederacy -- a centuriesold coalition of northeastern tribes. It says that each of us should consider every action we take in terms of its effects upon on our unborn children seven generations from now. It emphasizes respecting and preserving the safety and wellbeing of elders.

Apparently these new "patriots" will have to learn some wisdom from the Indians the hard way -- at the voting booth. Although Indian voters are few in number, their voting blocks can determine close elections, especially in rural areas.

Recently, Republican Sen. Lisa Murkowski acknowledged that her

"success in running this historymaking write-in campaign would not have been possible if Alaska's Native people did not turn out at the polls, did not energize, did not come together as they did."

If the new Tea Party prevails, the future isn't very bright for the Seventh Generation of American Indians. The Tea Party apparently would break its social contract with them as conveniently as the U.S. broke those 800 treaties in the 1800s. America will put both in jeopardy if the Ryan budget is adopted.

Dave Baldridge, executive director of the International Association for Indigenous Aging, assisted Indian elders in creating their resolution. He is a citizen of Cherokee Nation. This op-ed was written in association with The OpEd Project, which seeks to expand the range of opinion voices.

Cherokee Nation welcomes 2012 Remember the Removal riders

■ Sixteen riders from the Cherokee Nation and seven riders from the Eastern Band make the trek.

CHEROKEE NATION COMMUNICATIONS

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. — After trekking 950 miles over seven states, a sweaty and more appreciative group of young Cherokees on the 2012 Remember the Removal ride rolled their bikes into the Cherokee Nation's Courthouse Square. It ended a three-week journey retracing the Trail of Tears of their ancestors.

Sixteen riders from the Cherokee Nation in Northeastern, Okla., and seven riders from the Eastern Band of Cherokees in North Carolina started the ride in New Echota, Ga., and finished June 22, welcomed by friends, family and tribal citizens.

"I am in awe of these riders and what they have done," Cherokee Nation Principal Chief Bill John Baker said during the return ceremony. "These kids are closer to their ancestors than they've ever been before. They've come together, they've bonded and they have created lifelong friendships."

The adventure was not without hardship or injury, including a few flat tires and minor bike wreck, but all 23 riders made it to Tahlequah in time to celebrate and receive medals presented by Chief Baker, Deputy Principal Chief Joe Crittenden and Miss Cherokee Sidney Kimble.

"When I started this journey I didn't know what lie within me," said rider Danielle Culp of Claremore. "I didn't know if I could make it, but there were a lot of people that knew what I was made of and knew that I could do it."

As the oldest rider to take the journey, Judy Castorena of the Eastern Band of Cherokees said that thought was never far behind as she remembered the experiences her ancestors faced on the Trail of Tears.

"Being the oldest always stuck with me," Castorena said as she recounted her toughest moment during the ride. "I was on a dirt road walking and pushing my bike when it hit me, I could have been the one left behind or the one getting whipped and pushed because I was the slowest. I could have been the one that died."

The Cherokee Nation has hosted the Remember the Removal Bike Ride for four years and in which the Eastern Band of Cherokees joined two years ago. The ride was originally started by 20 Cherokee students in 1984 and revived in 2009.

Indian Health Care Improvement Act permanent

■ Supreme Court decision upholds reauthorization

THOM WALLACE NCAI

WASHINGTON - In a 5-4 decision, the Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of the Affordable Care Act (ACA), affirming the permanent reauthorization of the Indian Health Care Improvement Act (IHCIA) which passed along with the ACA.

"This is an important step for health care in Indian Country; the permanence of the Indian Health Care Improvement Act has been affirmed and NCAI will stay focused on working with all members of Congress to uphold the trust responsibility to tribes," said Jefferson Keel, President of NCAI, the nation's oldest and most representative American Indian and Alaska Native advocacy organization. "Moving forward, we are focused on improving health care for Indian Country, while ensuring the Indian Health Care Improvement Act remains protected and implemented as enacted."

The IHCIA permanently authorizes daily health care delivery to nearly 2 million American Indians and Alaska Natives served by the Indian Health Service (IHS), who are in critical need of improved health care services. A snapshot of health conditions highlights the critical need for improving health care in Indian Country; Native people suffer from higher rates of diabetes and related illness, heart disease, and substance abuse than any other group.

The IHCIA authorizes new programs within the IHS to ensure the Service

Lawmakers consider next move for American Indian museum

SEAN MURPHY

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) - Eager to showcase Oklahoma's unique Native American heritage, lawmakers more than a decade ago launched an ambitious plan to erect a Smithsonianquality museum along the banks of the Oklahoma River.

But project officials, frustrated overruns, announced this week that the multimillion-dollar thorn in the state's side will be shelved at the end of the month.

"I think it was a mistake for the state to even go down that road," said state

Rep. Jason Nelson, R-Oklahoma City. "That said, we've got an extraordinary with construction delays and cost mound of dirt and steel beams sticking out of the ground, and we've got to decide what to do with it. "We can't just let it erode into the river," he said.

Ambassador, cancer survivor with a message: Indian skin won't protect you from melanoma

KAREN SHADE | NATIVE AMERICAN TIMES

Cierra Fields, 13, Little Miss Cherokee Ambassador, spreads the word about prevention of skin cancer. A former cancer patient herself, she shares her story and message with youth and adults in the Cherokee Nation.

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. - Anyone can get skin cancer. Cierra Lynn Fields learned that at an early age.

When she was four, she was bitten by a tick behind her ear near a small birthmark. The bite irritated her so much that it bled when she scratched at it. The school nurse looked at the spot behind her ear and then called Cierra's mother to advise that Cierra should be checked for skin cancer. It sounded crazy and impossible.

"You're thinking, 'Four-years-old,' for Pete's sake," said Terri Fields, Cierra's mom. "She'd been out in the sun, we had a swimming pool, but this was not what we expected."

What everyone, including Cierra's pediatrician, thought was a birthmark was inherited dysplastic nevus syndrome developing into melanoma - congenital melanoma. The tick bite had aggravated the skin and melanoma cells and made it more identifiable. Because of the bite and the actions of the school nurse, the family was able to address a condition that typically is discovered when the patient is a teenager.

Cancer-free for eight years, Cierra, now 13, religiously takes precautions to avoid sunburn, which can contribute to skin cancer. Because she has had it before, she is at high risk to develop it again. As a Little Miss Cherokee Ambassador, she has made skin cancer prevention among Indian people her platform.

"Cherokees, well, Native Americans in general, have the No. 1 highest death from skin cancer (among non-white people). And there's a myth that, 'We're Cherokee, we can't get skin cancer, we're dark.' It kind of doesn't make any sense because, hello, you have skin. Of course you can get it," Cierra said. According to a study by the Center for Disease Control and Prevention, Native American and Alaska Native people and Hispanics had the second highest rate of getting melanoma, a form of skin cancer. White people had the highest incidence

There is a common misunderstanding in the general population that people with dark skin are protected from skin cancer because of melanin, the pigment in the skin. The darker a person's skin, the more melanin is present in it. Darker skin has more UV filtration capacity, but there is still a risk of Health professionals also fight attitudes in the battle against skin cancer, said Greg Bilby, public health educator and outreach coordinator for Cherokee Nation Comprehensive Health Cancer Control Program.

"A lot of people don't realize the danger," he said. "They think skin cancer is not that important, that breast, colon and lung cancer is more prevalent, but cancer is cancer. If you had cancer near a lymph node, it can spread throughout body" through the lymphatic system, which reaches all the extremities.

Activists seek return of Indian land

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) -Two Democratic National Convention delegates from Nebraska are asking President Barack Obama to return a piece of the state to a South Dakota Indian tribe.

Frank LaMere says he and his daughter, Lexie, will present delegates with a resolution aimed at Whiteclay, Neb., at the party meeting in Charlotte, N.C. Both are citizens of Nebraska's Winnebago Indian Tribe.

Whiteclay is known for beer sales on the border of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, where alcohol is banned. It was part of Pine Ridge when Congress created the reservation in 1889.

The resolution seeks an executive order to restore a 50-square-mile buffer zone known as the Whiteclay extension, which was designed to protect Pine Ridge from whiskey peddlers. President Theodore Roosevelt opened all but one square mile to settlers in 1904.

Native speakers looking to start immersion daycare

Immersion teachers are not only required to be fluent in the language but must also be able to convey their understanding and mastery of the language to students.

KRISTI EATON Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) - Tama I'atala doesn't want his children to feel as disconnected from their Lakota heritage as he does from his Samoan culture.

I'atala, who is part Lakota and lives on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, has a solution: Have his children, including his 17-month-old son, learn the language.

"I don't want my kids to grow up without that sense of pride of who they are," said l'atala, 36.

I'atala is part of a small group of people on the reservation trying to start a Lakota language-immersion daycare for infants in hopes of increasing the number of people fluent in the language and, ultimately, strengthening the Lakota culture.

There are fewer than 6,000 Lakota speakers - less than 14 percent of the Lakota population in North and South Dakota, and the average age of a Lakota speaker is 60.

Several other efforts are under way to preserve the Lakota language, but the daycare is unique because the children would be taught Lakota as the primary language. The hope is the children would feed into Lakota-first preschools and elementary schools.

"We think really the best way to approach immersion from Step 1 is to start with kids who are preverbal infants and can therefore learn Lakota as a first language," Peter Hill said. Hill, originally from Philadelphia, moved to the reservation several years ago and learned Lakota. He has taught it at several area schools – and to his 2-yearold daughter.

"It seems that kids really see their first language as their default language, their home-base language. Even in a really successful immersion program where kids can become successful, it never quite has that centrality to them," he said.

But Hill and the other daycare supporters are having trouble finding between $76,000 and $108,000 in grants and resources necessary to pay the salaries of two fulltime Lakota-speaking caregivers, an administrator and miscellaneous expenses. With the economy still in recovery mode, many organizations are cutting back or not awarding new grants, Hill said.

On the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, which straddles the North Dakota-South Dakota border, a similar effort is under way. The Standing Sioux Rock Tribe received grants from the Administration of Native Americans to offer what is called an immersion nest. As many as 10 3-year-olds will take part in the program starting in September, said project director Sacheen Whitetail Cross.

One of the biggest hurdles in Lakota language immersion is finding qualified teachers, said Wilhelm K. Meya, executive director of the Lakota Language Consortium, a nonprofit organization trying to preserve and revitalize the 'Mount McKinley' is the official name of America's tallest mountain. The Alaska landmark is known to Natives as 'Denali.'

Senator introduces bill to give America's tallest mountain its Native name back

BECKY BOHRER Associated Press

JUNEAU, Alaska (AP) - U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski has introduced legislation to change the name of North America's tallest peak from Mount McKinley to Mount Denali.

It is the latest move in a decades-long fight over the name of the mountain, widely referred to as Denali by Alaskans.

For years, members of Ohio's congressional delegation have filed measures or included language in bills to retain the name Mount McKinley; Ohio is the birthplace of President William McKinley. One such measure is currently pending, introduced by U.S. Reps. Tim Ryan and Betty Sutton.

Murkowski said opponents of a name change can continue to refer to the peak as Mount McKinley. Under her bill, the Alaskan name for the mountain would become the "technically correct" term for what is an Alaska landmark,

"Making Denali - the name that Alaskans use anyway - the official name of America's tallest mountain means something to Alaska," Murkowski told a subcommittee earlier this week.

Murkowski has also introduced legislation to rename the Talkeetna Ranger Station in Alaska for Walter Harper, credited as the first person to reach the peak's summit.

According to a National Park Service history, McKinley, the name bestowed on the peak by William Dickey in 1896, stuck because of his "discovery' account" in the New York Sun in January 1897. This was in spite of the fact that Alaska Natives, Russians and American visitors had offered names of their own for the mountain over the years.

The name Denali is an Athabascan, or Alaska Native tribe, word meaning "the high one."

A move to change the name took hold in the 1970s, championed by then-Alaska Gov. Jay Hammond. The state Legislature, in 1975, passed a resolution urging the Interior secretary to direct the U.S. Board on Geographic Names to rename Mount McKinley as Mount Denali and Mount McKinley National Park to Denali National Park, according to the history.

Ohio U.S. Rep. Ralph Regula vowed to fight the name change, and did, through measures or language included in bills until his retirement in January 2009.

The park's name, however, eventually was changed to Denali National Park and Preserve.

Crystal Patterson, a spokeswoman for Ohio Rep. Tim Ryan, said keeping the mountain's name is important to honor President McKinley. Patterson said Regula asked Ryan to continue the fight against a name change.

The Board on Geographic Names has taken the position that it won't address a geographic feature name pending before Congress. The board, comprised of representatives of some federal agencies, is involved in formally naming features and gets as many as 300 proposals a year to change a name or name an unnamed feature, the board's executive secretary, Lou Yost, said Friday.

The dispute over Mount McKinley is unusual, he said.

"Some names will cause some emotions and some consternation, but I don't think we've had any that have gone on this long, or (at) that high of a level," he said.

Businessman embraces Tenn. Indian mound

(AP) - A Chattanooga businessman has welcomed visitors to his commercial property – the site of one of the city's oldest Indian mounds.

Kenny Wilhoit, an Amnicola Highway food manufacturer, was surprised about the discovery of the mound a few years ago. He listened intently to local American Indians when they called him, seeking a conservation easement on the

According to the Chattanooga Times Free Press (http://bit. ly/M4vvod), Wilhoit then did something very unusual - he encouraged visits to what they told him was a very sacred spot.

"It means something to them, and it's not hurting me," said Wilhoit, president and owner of Atlantic Distributors Inc.

The story resonates for the tri-state region, which has thousands of mounds.

Meg Lockhart, spokeswoman for the Division of Archaeology in the Tennessee Department of Environment and Conservation, said there are 900 mound sites recorded to date across Tennessee alone.

Tom Kunesh of Chattanooga, a member of the Advisory Council on Tennessee Indian Affairs, calls the Amnicola mound "the oldest thing in Chattanooga that humans made."

And Kunesh, archaeologists from Nashville and a handful of other Chattanoogans interested in the region's earliest and American Indian history celebrated Sacred Sites Day at the mound on the summer equinox of June 20. In the ceremony, they honored Wilhoit, along with the ancestors buried there.

"He's been great to work with," Kunesh said. "He's allowed us access, and we've been out maybe four times in the past year, cleaning it up. It's like cleaning up a cemetery."

The new friends renamed the mound. What had been labeled 40HA66 in the state Division of Archaeology is now the Chickamauga Mound.

The name is intended to reflect the mound's American Indian origin rather than the Euro-American name it sometimes carried: the Roxbury mound, because the Roxbury textile mill had been built nearby in the Mark Tolley of Nashville was the first to contact Wilhoit and talk to him about the mound on his 25-acre plant site.

Wilhoit said he always thought it was just a small treecovered hill.

"He (Tolley) filled me in that this was an Indian mound -2,000 years old," Wilhoit said. "And Tom (Kunesh) came in and spent hours with me, talking to me about it and its history."

Wilhoit said what he heard about the mound on his property touched him.

"We know it is a sacred site. We know it's not to be disturbed," he said.

Church fireworks stand targeted by Tulsa mayor

■ The fundraiser is located on a five-acre parcel that is considered Indian land and is not under the city's jurisdiction.

NATIVE TIMES STAFF REPORT

TULSA, Okla. - City officials and a church youth group are at odds over a fireworks stand on Indian land.

On June 26, the First Church of the Nazarene from Broken Arrow, Okla., opened a fireworks stand adjacent to the South Yale Smoke Shop at 111th Street and Yale Avenue in Tulsa, Okla. The smoke shop is on a Muscogee (Creek) allotment within a primarily residential area.

Meant to be a fundraiser for a mission trip and the church's youth group, the stand generated about $400 that day.

The next day, officers with the Tulsa Police Department and fire marshal's office placed signs around the allotment's perimeter, listing the city's fireworks policy and penalties for violating it. Mayor Dewey Bartlett announced that same day that anyone who purchased fireworks at the stand could have them confiscated upon leaving the property and re-entering the city's jurisdiction.

Mike Bergman, spokesman for Broken Arrow Residents for Red Clay Casino, told the Tulsa World last week that Bartlett's threat was an affront against Native Americans, who were being unfairly targeted.

"It appears Mr. Bartlett has the same agenda as (U.S. Rep. John) Sullivan: attacking Native American sovereignty," Bergman said in an article published by the Tulsa World June 29. "Our group was able to expose (Sullivan's) agenda. I think now it is time to expose Mr. Bartlett's, as well."

The allotment is within the city limits. Since 1938, it is illegal to buy, sell, own or shoot off fireworks within the Tulsa city limits.

One of more than 30 original allotments within Tulsa, the five-acre parcel is considered Indian land and is not under the city's jurisdiction. The property owners got a permit from the Bureau of Indian Affairs to sell fireworks on their land and also received a license from the Muscogee (Creek) Nation.

The stand was not operated in affiliation with the Muscogee (Creek) Nation. Their location from previous years was unavailable and TNT Fireworks, the stand's owner, suggested and secured the site.

City officials claimed their actions were prompted by complaints to the mayor's office and to the area's city councilor, Phil Lakin. Earlier this year, Lakin warned the other council members the allotment could be used for a casino, despite the terms of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation's financing agreements for its River Spirit Casino that prohibit the tribe from opening a second casino within 50 miles. River Spirit Casino is less than 10 miles from the allotment.

After last Wednesday's crack down, the church suspended sales and has not announced plans to relocate the KC Willis opened the Lightshine Thrift Store to offer residents of Pine Ridge a nearby place to buy simple everyday items, such as books and clothes.

New store opens in Whiteclay, caters to rez

Going down the street to pick up items at Walmart, Target or another store isn't possible on Pine Ridge.

KRISTI EATON Associated Press

WHITECLAY, Neb. - In a tiny Nebraska border town that has become known more for alcohol than anything else, KC Willis is hoping to change perceptions.

Willis has opened LightShine Thrift Store in Whiteclay, a town of about 12 people just across from the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota.

"I've been coming to Pine Ridge for a year," said the Longmont, Colo.resident. "Over the course of that year, I began to realize there was no place on the rez for people to get the essentials, at least on the southern half. There was no place for a mom to get socks or a shirt for her daughter for school without going to Rapid City or Chadron, Neb."

The reservation, home to the Oglala Sioux Tribe, spans more than 2.7 million acres and is located in one of the poorest areas of the country.

Going down the street to pick up items at Walmart, Target or another store isn't possible on Pine Ridge, where even basic infrastructure like gutters and sidewalks are lacking. And traveling by car 100 miles northwest to Rapid City or 50 miles south to Chadron can be problematic for residents without reliable transportation.

Whiteclay, located two miles south of the reservation, is where many of the tribal members go for groceries. It's also where some go for alcohol. The Oglala Sioux Tribe has sued the town's beer stores and several distributors, saying they are knowingly contributing to alcoholism on the reservation, where alcohol is banned

Willis has both a simple and complex goal in opening the 7,500-square-foot store. She wants to offer a place where residents of Pine Ridge can go to buy simple everyday items such as books and clothes. She also wants people to see that Whiteclay and the Lakota people can do good things. The store is in Whiteclay and not on the reservation because rent is cheaper in Whiteclay and because the complicated process that non-tribal members must go through to rent on the reservation can be time-consuming, Willis said.

Plus, she added, "I'm close enough to the reservation to service them but I'm not inside the reservation taking up a building that could be owned by a Lakota business."

The store, which opened about two weeks ago, carries furniture, shoes, clothes and books. The items are mostly donated. Two tribal members work with Willis to run the store.

Willis hopes to open an art studio for tribal artists in the future in the back of the store. There's also a ministry component to the store, but Willis, who is white, said she will not be preaching to the Oglala Sioux people about what they should be doing.

"They've had enough white people trying to do stuff like that," she said.

Vic Clarke, the manager of Arrowhead Foods in Whiteclay, said he hopes the new thrift store can last in Whiteclay. However, catering to tourists is difficult, he said, because many are uneasy about the town and the people who line up on the street and panhandle there.

Willis also will have to work at building a reliable client base among the tribe, Clarke said.

"People are not going to come buy. They're going to want to come trade," he said.

Available funds for the continuation of construction for The American Indian Cultural Center and Museum in Oklahoma City have been exhausted. Construction halts July 1.

MUSEUM

The total price tag for the project is already up to $91 million, with more than $63 million coming from three separate bond proposals that passed the Legislature. The rest of the money is from private donors, Oklahoma City and federal stimulus funds.

Museum officials say they need an additional $80 million to finish the project and are lobbying lawmakers for half that amount - $40 million - to match private donations that have been pledged contingent upon the state support.

That's a tough sell in the Republicancontrolled Legislature, where many are loudly decrying more state spending. Gov. Mary Fallin and Senate President Pro Tem Brian Bingman both have said they support a bond issue to complete the project. However, some legislators are completely opposed to the concept of state bond issues while others think enough has been spent on the project already.

"I'm not opposed to the project by any means. I think it will be a great project for Oklahoma City, but for state taxpayers to continue to dump money into this thing, I don't think it's fair," said state Sen. Cliff Aldridge, R-Midwest City. "At some point you've got to draw a line in the sand, and I think we're at that point."

Aldridge said he will push for legislation that transfers ownership of the project and its oversight to the city, but he acknowledged House and Senate leadership likely will try another bond issue next year after the elections.

Oklahoma City Mayor Mick Cornett didn't completely discount the idea of taking over the project, but said the next move must be decided by lawmakers.

"I think the ball is in the state's hands. They need to decide what they want to do with it," Cornett said. "I don't think it would be appropriate for the ideas to start coming from us. At some point, I will be more proactive, but at this point, I'm trying to let them figure out what's next."

The Oklahoma City Council agreed earlier this year to put an additional $9 million into the project, but Cornett said that money was contingent on lawmakers approving a bond issue this year. He said he's not sure how the council would vote a second time.

"We'd have to be re-inspired," he said.

Developers have said the museum would house collections from the more than 30 federally recognized Oklahoma-based tribes, the National Museum of the American Indian in Washington and other tribal museums.

Several Oklahoma tribes are among those who have donated money to match a $40 million state bond issue, and some tribal officials remain optimistic the project will be completed.

"Even in light of recent developments, we know there are many who continue to support completion of the American Indian Cultural Center and Museum," Chickasaw Nation Gov. Bill Anoatubby said in a statement. "We plan to continue working to help make this dream a reality."

Cherokee Nation Principal Chief Bill John Baker said with Native American references on the flag, seal, place names and even car tags, the influence of American Indians is almost impossible to ignore in Oklahoma.

"Those references celebrate the nonnative view of our people, so it is particularly disappointing that the efforts to build a cultural center to celebrate our rich Native culture, history and traditions have fallen short," he said. "This is a project that could potentially be a boon to the state's tourism and hospitality industries and I would hope that given the current economic downturn, Oklahoma would take advantage of any opportunity to bring more dollars into Oklahoma."

Study shows treating diabetes early, intensively is best strategy

DEBBIE BOLLES

DALLAS, Texas – Intensive early treatment of type 2 diabetes slows down progression of the disease by preserving the body's insulin-producing capacity, a UT Southwestern study has shown.

"We can potentially change the course of this prevalent disease, which would represent a breakthrough," said Dr. Ildiko Lingvay, assistant professor of internal medicine and author of the study published online in Diabetes Care. "The intensive treatment regimen we propose is different from the stepwise approach recommended in standard guidelines."

As one of the fastest-growing diseases in the U.S., diabetes afflicts an estimated 25.8 million children and adults, or 8.3 percent of the population, according to the American Diabetes Association. A study by Population Health Management projects the number of diabetes cases to nearly double by 2025.

The UT Southwestern study was selected for presentation at the recent American Diabetes Association's Diabetes Care Symposium and will be published in the July print issue of ADA's Diabetes Care.

While intensive treatment has been the standard at UT Southwestern for at least a decade, the industry norm has been to emphasize lifestyle changes first. The American College of Physicians, for example, suggests losing weight and dieting before drug treatment. The ADA recommends similar lifestyle changes, plus the use of metformin – the standard drug used to treat type 2 diabetes – for those newly diagnosed.

"We believe that the stepwise approach exposes patients to long periods of high blood sugar, which leads to complications," Dr. Lingvay said. "Unless dietary changes are significant and sustained long-term, diabetes is a progressive disease in which the body's ability to produce insulin declines."

If a patient can maintain insulin production, she explained, the disease is easier to manage. The study showed intensive treatment with insulin, followed by one of two drug regimens, enabled diabetes patients to maintain steady insulin-producing beta-cell function for three and a half years after diagnosis.

"This finding was true, regardless of the method used to attain intensive control," Dr. Lingvay said. "Intensive treatments led to excellent control of blood-sugar levels, they were well-tolerated, safe, and had good compliance."

In the UT Southwestern clinical trial,

participants were randomly divided into two groups. Both groups first had three months of treatment with insulin and the anti-diabetes drug metformin. After that, one group took three types of diabetes medications daily, while the other continued the insulin and metformin treatment. Out of 63 initial trial recruits, 58 completed the study and are still being tracked for six-year results.

Dr. Lingvay said the study did not show that any single regimen worked better than another; both intensive treatment regimens were just as effective.

"The point is that whatever you choose, make sure it's intensive," she said. "We have shown that this preserves beta-cell function, and that's the key in changing the course of the disease."

Other UT Southwestern researchers involved in the study were Dr. Lindsay Harrison, an endocrinology fellow; Beverley Adams-Huet, assistant professor in clinical sciences and internal medicine; and Dr. Philip Raskin, professor of internal medicine.

The research was supported by grants from the National Institutes of Health and Novo Nordisk Inc., a supplier of insulin. Novo Nordisk played no role in the study design, conduct, analysis, preparation, or final approval.

5 tips for safe summer sun

Many believe a "base tan" will prevent damaging burns, that's not the case. There is no such thing as a healthy or base tan.

KEVIN RONNEBERG, M.D.

Summer has arrived. As the weather heats up, it's critical for beachgoers and outdoor fun-seekers to be sun-safe.

This begins with choosing the right sunscreen to protect yourself from harmful UV rays. Equally important are these five simple tips from the Skin Cancer Foundation, which also will help you mitigate sun damage and reduce the risk of skin cancer.

First, seek the shade. Simply minimizing exposure to UVA and UVB rays can go a long way toward protecting your skin. Taking a break from direct sun is especially important between the hours of 10 a.m. and 4 p.m., when rays are strongest. And remember, clouds don't block UV rays.

Infants under 6 months should always be kept out of the sun -- protected with clothing, an umbrella or a stroller hood. Children and adults should wear protective clothing, including wide-brimmed hats and UV-blocking sunglasses.

Second, use a broad spectrum (UVA/UVB) sunscreen with SPF 15 or higher. Regardless of the season, this kind of sun protection should be used on a daily basis. Most people understand the importance of sun safety during the summer months, but many underestimate the need for year-round protection. The temperature may drop, but UV rays remains strong. And the cooler temperatures may actually prevent people from realizing the extent of the damage the sun is doing to their skin.

Next year, new regulations from the Food and Drug Administration will help consumers know they're getting the right protection by prohibiting manufactures from labeling their sunscreens as "broad spectrum" or making claims about protecting against skin cancer and aging unless they're SPF 15 or higher. And sunscreens with lower SPF values will have to sport a warning that the product may not offer protection against the harmful effects of exposure to Third, apply 1 ounce of sunscreen to the entire body 30 minutes before going outside.

According to the Skin Cancer Foundation, for full SPF protection, sunscreen must be applied half an hour before sun exposure. If you are average size, you'll need a full ounce -- or about two tablespoons -- to adequately cover your skin. Studies show that most people apply less than half that amount, losing the full benefit of the SPF protection.

Reapplication is just as important as putting sunscreen on in the first place, as sunscreens tend to break down with exposure and can be rubbed off or washed off by sweat or water. So sunscreen should be applied every two hours, and immediately after swimming or a set of tennis. During a full day at the beach, one person should expect to use at least a quarter of an 8 oz. bottle of sunscreen.

Fourth, do not let yourself burn. Sunburn is the most immediate and obvious sign of UV damage. When immune cells race to the injured skin site to start healing the damage, they produce the reddening and swelling.

Tanning is the skin's response to this damage and may permanently affect skin cells. While many believe a "base tan" will prevent damaging burns, that's not the case. There is no such thing as a healthy or base tan.

Finally, check your skin regularly and ask your doctor for a skin cancer exam annually. One in five Americans will develop skin cancer. Tans and burns can be the first step. Intermittent but intense UV exposure is more closely associated with melanoma, the most deadly variety of skin cancer, than chronic sun exposure. One blistering sunburn in childhood or five in a lifetime doubles the risk of melanoma.

To check yourself for signs of skin damage, inspect your skin from head to toe, looking for spots or sores that heal too slowly, new growths, and any moles or beauty marks that change in color, texture, or size. And once each year, be sure to ask your physician for a skin checkup.

Sunscreens are an essential part of a healthy lifestyle. They keep skin looking young and reduce the risk of many skin cancers. They must be used properly, however. These five suggestions will help keep you and your skin safe.

On the go: Diabetics have a few 'firsts' to look to forward to

GINNY GRIMSLEY
News & Experts

A whole industry has grown up around freeing diabetics to lead less restricted lives. Tubeless insulin pumps, a needleless blood-glucose monitoring system, and diabetic-friendly frozen foods are among the innovations helping people with the metabolic disorder to live lives on the go.

With the number of diabetics growing worldwide – 246 million at last count, according to the World Health Organization – businesses are motivated. In 2011, diabetes therapeutic products were a $23.7 billion dollar industry feeding a growing population that's starving for a better quality of life, says Chef Robert Lewis, "The Happy Diabetic," author of two cookbooks for people with the metabolic disorder.

"It wasn't long ago that Type 1 diabetics had to be sure they packed ample sterile syringes and insulin, whether they were going to work for the day or on a road trip," he says. "Monitoring blood sugar levels, which is crucial to keeping vital organs healthy, was painful, primitive and hit-or-miss.

"And food? That's been the hardest. A diabetes diagnosis can feel like a life sentence of bland eating."

Among the "firsts" Lewis says diabetics can look forward to:

• The first tubeless insulin pump. Thirty years ago, people with insulindependent diabetes had to give themselves shots around the clock to control their blood sugar levels. In some cases, diabetics were hospitalized to ensure they got the insulin necessary to prevent ketoacidosis, a condition that can lead to coma and death. In 1983, the insulin pump was introduced. It attaches to the body and provides continuous insulin injections. But while it was a major breakthrough, it can be bulky and awkward, with a dangling catheter. The most recent innovation is a streamlined version called the OmniPod. It has no tubes, it's smaller and it attaches anywhere on the body with adhesive. It also has a built-in glucose-monitoring system.

• The first needleless glucometer. The Symphony tCGM System uses ultrasound to monitor blood-sugar levels, which will free people from the painful pricks needed to get a small blood sample for testing multiple times a day. The device, which attaches with adhesive to the body, continuously tracks glucose levels day and night and can send the readings to your smart phone. Under development for more than a decade, Symphony is undergoing the studies necessary to win regulatory approval.

• The first diabetic-friendly frozen meals. Meals-in-a-Bun (www. lifestylechefs.net) will arrive in Northeast U.S. grocery stores beginning in July and roll out across the country through the end of the year. They're low on the glycemic index, low in sugar and carbs, high in soluble fiber, low in trans fat, high in lean protein and low in sodium, Lewis says. "And the best thing is, they are delicious." The five varieties – two vegan and three vegetarian – include selections like Thai Satay, mushrooms, broccoli and tofu in wholewheat flax bun. "This is particularly exciting because, while there have been advances in equipment that makes life easier for diabetics, there haven't been for convenient, packaged foods."

Diabetics who do not watch what they eat may wind up suffering kidney damage, stomach problems, heart disease, pneumonia, gum disease, blindness, stroke, nerve damage, complications during pregnancy, loss of limb and other health problems, according to the CDC.

But many Americans are trending toward healthier diets, eating less meat, gluten, salt and sugar, Lewis says. Tasty foods developed for diabetics will be excellent choices for them, too.

"What's good for diabetics is good for everyone," he says. "And you don't have to give up one teaspoon of flavor.

"There's a reason why I am called 'The Happy Diabetic'; I have discovered the joy of nutrition-rich food."

behind her ear and two lymph nodes nearby. She also took radiation pills and had frequent check-ups, but she did not require chemotherapy. She shares her experience with students and adults at presentations she makes all around the Cherokee Nation at schools and at area health care centers.

Focus in the CN Comprehensive Health Cancer Control Program is split into two directions: prevention of breast and cervical cancer and prevention of other forms of cancer, including colon, prostate and skin cancer.

In the last two months, Cierra, her mom and her grandmother, Leona Henderson, have driven from their Fort Gibson home to Jay, Tahlequah, Catoosa and other locations to add a push to CN's campaign for skin cancer awareness and prevention.

"Slip, Slop, Slap and Wrap" translates to slip on a shirt, slop on sunscreen, slap on a hat and put on a pair of wraparound sunglasses.

Bilby said this message is important especially now as summer hits and the sun is in full force. Cierra's presence bolstered his presentation to a key audience that can be difficult to reach.

Just before summer, "we always do a big push to encourage people to take care of their skin," Bibly said. "Cierra was ideal (to help) because she's so young, and that encourages, especially, young girls to take care of their skin."

Reaching teenagers is significant to educating the population because that is usually the time when they begin tanning outdoors or on tanning beds to achieve a summer look.

At a recent talk, Bilby made his presentation. The kids, said Henderson, didn't seem to pay much attention until Cierra stepped up. A few girls in her audience even said they planned to visit a doctor about their skin.

Cierra wanted all of the students to be aware of the damage caused by tanning under the sun as well as under a lamp. A tanning bed also emits UV rays. Tanning becomes popular as prom season draws near. Her own opinion of tanning bed use is not favorable, likening it to cooking bacon on a grill.

"That's gross," she said. "You look gross when you're old, and you look leathery."

Bilby said he notices the difference with youth, too.

"I can put up a Power Point (presentation) to show how dangerous tanning beds are to them, but when they see someone younger than them, it makes them really think about it," he said.

Bilby became aware of Cierra and her work when he received an email about two months ago that she was collecting donations of coloring and activity books, crayons and other items for children undergoing treatment for cancer at the Children's Hospital at St. Francis in Tulsa. Gifts of stickers, puzzles, DVDs and more in addition to the coloring books came in from CN employees, students attending Sequoyah High School and other places around Tahlequah.

When she delivered the donations to the hospital, she visited with children on IV fluids and undergoing intense chemotherapy treatment. The children were grateful for the gifts.

"It's just touching to see how much a coloring book can make a child so happy," Cierra said. "It makes me really glad that I didn't have to spend any of that hospital time (for her own treatment). I could go still go outside and play."

The children at the hospital could do nothing to prevent their cancer, but everyone, including Native Americans, can take precautions against skin cancer.

If you have a suspicious, nonsymmetrical mole that changes in color or shape, see a doctor.

Moapa Paiutes blame power plant for early deaths, sickness

CRISTINA SILVA Associated Press

MOAPA, Nev. (AP) - Beyond the ancestral hunting fields and the rows of small, sparse homes, the cemetery at the Moapa River Indian Reservation sprawls across a barren hill with the tombstones of tribal members who died young.

Their deaths haunt this small desert community outside Las Vegas. Children play indoors, afraid they might be next. Hoping to keep out the air they believe is killing their people, tribal elders keep their windows shut and avoid growing food on the land where their ancestors once found sustenance.

The Moapa Paiutes need not travel far to stare down their perceived enemy: The coal-powered plant blamed for polluting the southern Nevada reservation's air and water is visible from nearly every home.

Across the country, a disproportionate number of power plants operate near Indian tribal lands. Some tribes embrace the plants, which provide jobs and tax dollars to their communities. But a small group have begun to protest the plants in recent years, asking that they be closed.

Navajo lawmakers reject water rights settlement

■ Tribes often trade what could be huge water claims for the promise of federal funding to deliver water to tribal communities.

FELICIA FONSECA
Associated Press

FLAGSTAFF, Ariz. (AP)

- Navajo lawmakers have rejected a settlement to recognize the tribe's water rights from the Little Colorado River basin, likely sending the tribe and its Hopi neighbor back to court to resolve their 15-6 against the settlement last week during a special session in Window Rock. The vote also puts a stop to legislation in Congress to move the settlement forward because it needed the blessing of both the Navajo and Hopi tribes.

The Tribal Council voted

"I think it's a missed opportunity," said Jared King, a spokesman for the Navajo Nation. "These things don't come by very often. It's disappointing."

Critics saw the settlement as an attack on their aboriginal rights and tilted toward corporate interests. They urged lawmakers to vote it down and continue fighting in court. A case in Apache County had been on hold while the tribes and 30 other entities worked out a settlement decades in the making. Aside from Zuni Pueblo, no other Arizona tribe has acquired rights to the Little Colorado River.

Under the settlement, the tribes would have waived further claims to the river basin if the federal government funded more than $300 million in groundwater delivery projects. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., sponsor of the water bill, had said the settlement would address the water needs of the reservations and provide certainty of the state's water supply for off-reservation communities.

Tribes often trade what could be huge water claims for the promise of federal funding to deliver water to tribal communities. A few American Indian water rights cases have been resolved through litigation.

Navajo President Ben Shelly ultimately backed the settlement as a way to avoid protracted courtroom battle and guarantee water delivery to tribal communities. He and Tribal Council Speaker Johnny Naize held public hearings across the reservation and received hundreds of comments on the settlement.

Shelly said Thursday that he would look for other ways to bring water to the communities on the western side of the reservation.

Naize has said lawmakers weren't willing to accept the settlement as is and had urged colleagues to table it for further discussion. He said he would advocate for an independent review of the settlement and renewed negotiations that would result in more favorable terms for the tribe, though it's unclear whether the other parties would be willing to work toward another settlement.

"We will not be rushed into a settlement that a majority of our citizens are uncomfortable with," said Naize, who voted in favor of it July 5.

The Hopi Tribe took two separate votes on the matter – one to oppose Kyl's legislation and the other to support the settlement.

Much of the opposition to the settlement came from a provision that would provide the Navajo Nation capital with water from the Colorado River if the tribe extends the lease for a coal-fired power plant and the waiver language. But the failure of the Navajo Nation to extend the lease would not have killed the settlement in its entirety.

NY holding on to seized Indian cigarettes

MICHAEL VIRTANEN Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) – New York officials are holding on to a truckload of untaxed Indian-made cigarettes they seized, challenging the recent order of a state judge who said the state had to give them back.

State police and the Cuomo administration say they are not changing their enforcement practices despite the court ruling. New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman has filed an appeal notice that temporarily halts the order of state Supreme Court Justice David Demarest.

Demarest ruled on June 18 that there was no tax due on the 26,000 cartons of Signal-brand cigarettes going from the St. Regis Mohawk Reservation to HCI Distributors, a subdivision of the Winnebago Tribe of Nebraska, finding no legal basis under current New York tax law or regulations to hold them. They were taken from a tractor-trailer stopped Jan. 23 at a U.S. Border Patrol checkpoint at Waddington in northern New York.

Last November, administration officials said state law subjects unstamped cigarettes to seizure regardless of the origin or destination.

Richard Azzopardi, spokesman for Gov. Andrew Cuomo said: "This administration is enforcing the law and we will continue to do so."

Representatives of cigarette manufacturers on the Akwesasne Mohawk Reservation in northern New York, whose business has been hurt by seizures this year including some other truckloads, met with administration officials last week in Albany but declined afterward to comment. No progress was reported.

HCI sued state police, St. Lawrence County District Attorney Nicole Duve and her assistant, Jonathan Becker, arguing it had legally bought the cigarettes from Ohserase Manufacturing LLC on the Mohawk reservation and that it had accurate paperwork that specified its destination as the Winnebago reservation in Nebraska.

State police seized the tobacco. Demarest concluded no taxes were due and said no criminal or civil proceedings were ever begun, so the cigarettes should be returned.

Calls to Duve and Becker were not returned.

"Here, the New York State Police, at the specific direction of the St. Lawrence County District Attorney, has seized property owned by the petitioner, without a warrant and without commencing a criminal complaint," Demarest wrote. He rejected the state's argument that the cigarettes needed tax stamps.

Under New York law, cigarettes can be sold to tribe members without the state's tax of $4.35 per pack but should be taxed when sold to non-Indians. That has resulted in a booming discount cigarette business for some tribes who say that as sovereign nations they shouldn't pay state tax at all.

The state has renewed enforcement efforts following nearly two decades of failures. Recent measures included crackdowns on Internet sales and requiring cigarette wholesalers to prepay the sales taxes before supplying reservation stores with non-Native brands.

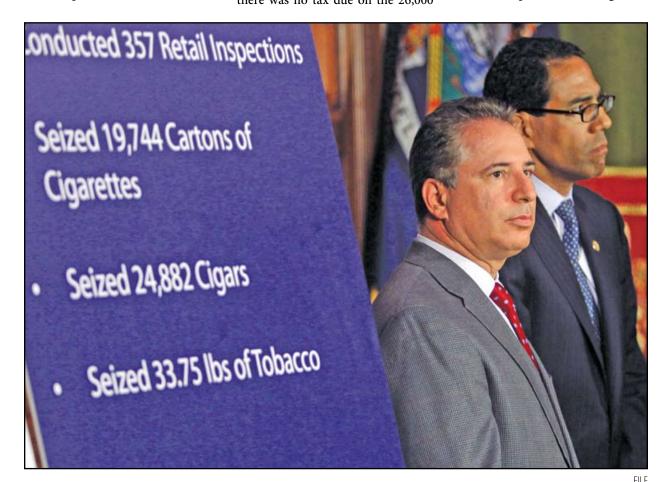

So far this year, troopers have seized more than 260,000 cartons of unstamped cigarettes.

The state Department of Taxation and Finance said it has taken possession of 180,000 cartons this year and has so far returned 108,500.

Newly elected St. Regis Mohawk Tribal Chief Paul Thompson, who was sworn in Sunday, told supporters economic development is his main objective and he wants to tackle the ongoing issue of state cigarette seizures, the Daily Courier-Observer in Massena reported Monday.

He said New York state "won't be happy until they take all our businesses."

Thompson said Demarest issued "a great ruling," that "hit it right on the head." He said he wants the tribal council to show public support.

DOI files counterclaim in Freedmen lawsuit

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) – The U.S. Department of the Interior has filed a counter-lawsuit seeking to stop the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma from denying tribal citizenship and other rights to the descendants of slaves once owned by some tribal members.

The counterclaim, filed in U.S. District Court in Tulsa last week, also seeks an injunction and a declaratory judgment that an 1866 treaty "provided Cherokee Freedmen and their descendants with `all the rights of native Cherokees,' including the right to citizenship in the Cherokee Nation."

The filing is the latest chapter in a longrunning dispute between the descendants of slaves, known as freedmen, and the secondlargest tribe in the United States.

The freedmen sued the Cherokee Nation after members voted in 2007 to amend the tribal constitution to restrict citizenship to those who could show at least one ancestor was listed on the Dawes Rolls. A federal court order has kept the citizenship of about 2,800 descendants intact pending the lawsuit's outcome.

Some Cherokees and members of other tribes in the southeastern U.S. were slaveholders, and were allied with the Confederacy during the Civil War. After the war ended and slavery was abolished, the Cherokee Nation and the federal government signed the Treaty of 1866, which said the freedmen and their descendants "shall have all the rights of native Cherokees."

The Interior Department wants the court to declare that the tribal constitution amendment is inconsistent with the Treaty of 1866. The tribe has argued that the treaty didn't give the freedmen perpetual citizenship rights and that, as a sovereign nation, it has a right to alter its constitution.

In a statement issued on the tribe's website, Principal Chief Bill John Baker said the claim will allow the case to move forward.

"We will have everyone at the table and all issues will be presented so we can get a definitive ruling," he said in the statement.

Marilyn Vann, president of the Descendants of Freedmen of the Five Civilized Tribes, called the filing "very positive."

"I'm very pleased with the filing," Vann said Wednesday. "I think they batted it out of the park."

An attorney representing the freed slaves' descendants, Jon Velie, told The Oklahoman the federal government could have requested the case be dismissed for technical reasons, but chose to fight it out in court.

Tribes say treaty fishing rights at risk

■ They say federal agencies have been overly focused on restricting harvest in recent years while ignoring improvements in habitat.

PHUONG LEAssociated Press

SEATTLE (AP) – More than 150 years ago, American Indian tribes in western Washington ceded much of the state to the federal government in return for guarantees of salmon and other fishing rights.

Now, those tribes say their treaty rights with the U.S. are at risk because the region is losing habitat that salmon need to survive. They say their treaty rights won't mean much if there's no salmon to harvest, and they're warning the federal government that they could resort to court action if more isn't done

"The tribes' treaty rights, the basis of their economy, culture and way of life are at stake," said Mike Grayum, executive director of Northwest Indian Fisheries Commission, an organization of 20 treaty tribes including the Hoh, Upper Skagit, Puyallup, Tulalip, Nooksack and Nisqually.

"Their very being is dependent on these natural resources. They don't exist without them. From the tribes' perspective, everything is at stake here. Their backs are against the wall."

Frustrated by the lack progress in recovering salmon in Puget Sound and along the coast, the western Washington tribes last summer took their concerns to the White House. In a report, they charged that the federal government has not lived up to its obligations under treaties signed in 1854 and 1855. The agreements preserved the tribes' right to harvest fish and shellfish in traditional grounds outside their reservation, a right reaffirmed in the 1974 Boldt decision

"We need a change," said Billy Frank Jr., chairman of the Northwest Indian Fisheries Commission and a member of the Nisqually Tribe, who was involved with fish-in protests in the early 1970s. "We're on a course that's going down. If we don't turn it around, there's not going to be anything left. ... We have to turn it around."

Last fall the White House Council on Environmental Quality directed regionalleaders of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Department of Agriculture to come up with a plan to address the tribes' concerns.

In May, those agencies agreed to better use their existing regulatory authorities and incentive programs to protect and restore salmon habitat. They also proposed a forum between tribes and federal agencies to resolve local habitat problems with tribes in Puget Sound and along the Washington coast.

Bob Turner, assistant regional administrator for the salmon management division of NOAA's National Marine Fisheries Service, said the agencies take seriously the issues the tribes raised.

"We need to do something to reverse the trends. We aren't gaining ground on habitat productivity," he said. "We are not in disagreement about the goal or concern."

The tribe is working on how to respond to the federal agencies.

"We would characterize it as a positive step forward ... but it's a small step," Grayum said. "It still comes up short of what we think is needed."

Despite millions of dollars spent on salmon recovery efforts in the region, steelhead and salmon such as the Puget Sound Chinook continue to struggle. Development, logging, loss of wetlands and floodplains, overfishing, pollution, bulkheads along shorelines, increased human activity and multiple other factors have contributed to their decline

"The fundamental problem is that we're losing habitat faster than we can restore it," Grayum said.

For many tribes that have lived for centuries along Washington's rivers and bays, fishing for salmon, digging clams and catching crabs are central to tribal cultural identity, as well as important for subsistence and commercial reasons.

"To be Jamestown is to walk down to the beach to get food for our families to share with our neighbors and to gather our foods in a fashion that we have done for centuries and know that they're going to be there," said Elaine Grinnel, 76, a member of the Jamestown S'Kallam Tribe on the Olympic peninsula.

"At no time did anybody have to go without food because it was so available. When you live on the beach and the tides are going in and out, there's food there. You could always go fishing, you could always go crabbing," she added.

Grinnel worried that the resources won't be there for future generations if more isn't done to protect habitat.

The tribes say federal agencies have been overly focused on restricting harvest in recent years while ignoring improvements in habitat.

Jeanette Dorner, salmon and ecosystem recovery director for the Puget Sound Partnership, said the tribes' concerns are very relevant to her agency's work. "To recover salmon, we have to recover the Puget sound ecosystem," she said.

"We have to stop destroying critical habitat and we need to restore natural processes and habitat. If we don't make progress on all of those things together than we can't recover the salmon," Dorner said.

The tribes blame the lack of political will and coordinated federal leadership, the government's failure to enforce its laws, as well as the uneven application of salmon conservation measures.

"We ceded all this land to the United States for a contract to protect our salmon, our way of life, our culture. We're gatherers and we're harvesters. And they forgot about us," Frank said.

USFS, elders group at odds over fire

FELICIA FONSECA Associated Press

FLAGSTAFF, Ariz. (AP) – The U.S. Forest Service extinguished a small fire being used in an indigenous group's religious ceremony in the Coconino National Forest and cited a group member after saying the fire was in violation of wildfire restrictions.

The agency let the fire burn into a third day before putting it out and issuing ceremony organizer Shawn Mulford a citation.

The action was low-key compared with the back-and-forth debate over the past couple of months between the two sides – one intent on maintaining its religious way of life and the other intent on protecting the forest from wildfires in a time of extreme fire danger.

The Indigenous Elders and Medicine Peoples Council prayed for a couple of hours before a law enforcement official walked over and doused the fire.

"It might be an end to this particular fire, but it's not an end to the prayers we're putting out in support of all people and all things," said Brett Ramey, who took part in the ceremony.

The ceremony was set to end July 7. The council had told Coconino National Forest officials that they wouldn't put out the fire after receiving an ultimatum July 5 to do so or face legal action.

The group said the fire built in the shadow of the San Francisco Peaks, which many American Indians consider sacred, was vital to the ceremony. The fire was used to send prayers to the creator, while making an offering of tobacco, and was only big enough to keep one log smoldering.

"This is our church," the council said late July 5. "Why do you come with your non-(American) Indian beliefs and take it away? We can't stop our ceremony just because someone says, 'I'm going to give you a citation."

Forest Supervisor Earl Stewart said he respects the council's cultural and religious rights but must err on the side of public health and safety. The group also had set up camp in an area closed to camping. Stewart said he would continue working with the group to find an alternate location and time for the ceremony should fire be involved.

"We must often make tough decisions such as closing an area to any camping and fire and understand this is a difficult decision for the council to accept," he said.

Much of Arizona is in fire restrictions because of drought and high temperatures. Two years ago, a 15,000-acre wildfire burned in the Coconino National Forest near the area where the group set up its ceremony. Forest officials currently are battling a 7,620-acre fire in another part of the forest near the Mogollon Rim. That fire is 85 percent contained.

The group said its relationship with fire and respect for it would ensure no flames would escape a pit dug 2 feet into the ground and encircled at the top with large rocks. A water bucket also sat nearby.

Many of Arizona's American Indian tribes also have restricted open fires on reservation land but make an exception for ceremonies with notice and proper firefighting equipment.

Robert Lapaca, forest manager at the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs Fort Apache Agency, said ceremonies are common in the summer – sometimes with a bonfire at night, an early morning fire and cooking fires. The agency requires a schedule for ceremonies and tools like fire extinguishers and water sources.

Some people even go so far as to rent fire engines for ceremonies, but Lapaca said it's not required.

"That's where the tribe is put in a hard place," he said. "They feel it's important for the ceremonies to occur and they, in turn, don't want to be the bad guy. They try to accommodate and ask that they take every precaution necessary to carry out their ceremonies."

High court ruling may impact Wyandotte's tribal land case in Kansas

WICHITA, Kan. (AP) – A Kansas legal fight over the Wyandotte Nation's efforts to build a Park City casino could be swayed by a U.S. Supreme Court ruling last month in a different case.

U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson last week ordered both the state and Interior Secretary Kenneth Salazar to address the impact of the June 18 high court opinion in a case involving acquisition of land in trust for Indian tribes.

Robinson wants written arguments on how the decision affects Salazar's request to dismiss the state's claims. Kansas is seeking an injunction prohibiting the Interior Department from acquiring Park City land into trust Kansas intervened after the Wyandotte Nation sued to force the Interior Department to accept Park City land the tribe bought in 1992 into trust.

Colleges profs learn about Native Americans

■ Educators across the country are taking part in the two-week workshop visiting Native American sites in Nebraska and Kansas.

JULIE BLUM Columbus Telegram

GENOA, Neb. (AP) – The walls that surrounded Judi Gaiashkibos once enclosed the classroom where her mother was educated more than 80 years ago.

Her mom was one of the students at the Genoa Indian School, a federally operated boarding school where Native American children received vocational training. The school was open from 1884-1934 and now is a museum.

It served as a training ground for assimilation into white society. Unlike some children, Gaiashkibos' mother went to the school willingly.

"The transition to the Genoa Indian School at that time wasn't as brutal," Gaiashkibos said.

When it first opened, children were sometimes stolen from their homes and placed in the school. Their long hair was cut, and they were even doused in gasoline to get rid of lice. They would be without contact from their family for years at a time.

The later years of the school were much more civil. That is what made the decision for Gaiashkibos' mom to attend Genoa Indian School in the 1920s easier.

"My mother came here to the school partly because it was a necessity. She was one of nine siblings, so that meant one less mouth to feed. But it was also because of education," Gaiashkibos said.

The effects the school had on her mother were long-lasting, and even rubbed off on Gaiashkibos as she grew up. She shared some of those feelings during a Native Americans workshop for community college teachers hostedbyCentralCommunity College-Columbus.

Educators across the country are taking part in the two-week workshop visiting Native American sites in Nebraska and Kansas. The main focus of the workshop is on indigenous people of the eastern part of the state, including the Pawnee, Ponca and Omaha tribes. Part of their day Tuesday was spent in Nance County, viewing the Indian School and stopping by the Pawnee Reburial Memorial in Genoa's Valley View Cemetery.

AnnMarie Beasley, a teacher at Cosumnes River College in Sacramento, Calif., was one of the 50 educators to take part in the workshop.

She said reading about the sites they visited in textbooks doesn't compare to witnessing the sites firsthand. That is the reason she took part in the workshop.

"It definitely gives you a better understanding of the Plains culture. The place is part of that," Beasley said. In particular, she said, Nebraska seems to be proud of its Native American culture.

Part of the experience was visiting with scholars, researchers and tribal leaders. Among them was Pat Leading Fox, head chief of the Nasharo Council of the Pawnee Nation. He performed a song at the Valley View Cemetery that was specifically created for the Pawnee Scouts. The bodies of several Pawnee Indians were reburied at the cemetery after being held at museums for years. Among the reburied in the cemetery are six Pawnee Scouts.

The Scouts were recruited to be part of the United States Army in the mid-19th Century. They were a key asset in America's westward expansion and in the building of the Union Pacific railroad.

A scholar in the program, Gaiashkibos, is executive director of Nebraska Commission on Indian Affairs.

She said the impact of her mother going to the Genoa Indian School was both positive and negative. Her mother learned cooking skills, which she used her entire life, and also a strong work ethic. But also mixed in were messages of shame that Indian people weren't good enough. That stuck with her mother and was also passed on to Gaiashkibos, who said she still struggles with self-esteem at times.

In her position, Gaiashkibos works to improve and promote cooperation between state and tribal government. One of the battles she faces is breaking down stereotypes.

"When you say Native American, usually something comes to mind. It is an image, a stereotype. We are very limited in your mind what we can do," she said, adding that it isn't a challenge that European descendants have to face.

But one of the messages that she preaches is overcoming preconceived notions.

"Sometimes we are our own worst enemies, but you can't paint us all with one paintbrush. All Indian people are not all one thing, but we can be everything we think we can be," Gaiashkibos said.

Harvard Med could pair with IHS for training

MICHAEL NEARY Capital Journal

PIERRE, S.D. (AP) – The corridors of Harvard Medical School might be leading to Native American communities on the Plains.

Representatives from the Indian Health Service and Massachusetts General Hospital – the teaching hospital for Harvard Medical School – visited South Dakota Urban Indian Health in Pierre recently to explore the possibility of bringing resident physicians to underserved Native health care centers in the state.

The Global Primary Care Program, part of Massachusetts General Hospital, already has partnerships in Chelsea, Mass., and in rural Uganda to reach underserved populations. The Indian Health Service, part of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, invited Global Primary Care Program members to look at South Dakota – both for their own medical training and for the services they can bring to the Native communities.

"I think it's a terrific fit," said Dr. Patrick Lee, director and founder of the Global Primary Care Program at Massachusetts General Hospital. He noted not only health care challenges but also cultural richness as factors that could help young physicians make real contributions as they broaden their own understanding.

Lee said the project might involve a rotation of residents who spend two to four weeks in South Dakota serving Native populations. Those populations include South Dakota Urban Indian Health centers in Pierre, Sioux Falls and Aberdeen, as well Indian Health Service agencies on the Pine Ridge and Rosebud reservations.

One resident physician, Dr. Matthew Tobey, is already in the state and will write a description of his experience for other residents who might consider coming after he leaves.

But Lee stressed that it's important to know if the presence of visiting resident physicians is welcome before giving the program a green light.

"That would be crucial," he said.

Tobey, visiting the South Dakota Urban Indian

Health recently, will be staying in the state for several weeks. Tobey is a resident physician in internal medicine/global primary care at Massachusetts General Hospital.

"This is a chance to work with communities facing a lot of challenges in their health care," he said.

As for the knowledge his colleagues in Massachusetts currently have about the area, he said: "essentially none."

But Lee and Tobey said they'd seen both problems and unusual courage in tackling those problems during their time here. That sort of challenge, they suggested, could be welcome to young physicians back in Massachusetts.

"They have a lot to teach," said Tobey, speaking of the Native residents he has encountered.

Lee said that if the program does proceed, young physicians would be in a position to learn about a region that's unfamiliar to them – and to consider it as a place to do some of their later work.

"They would be learning a tremendous amount," he said. "We've heard that this may serve as a recruitment opportunity as local providers have a chance to interact with them and share with them what it would be like to come back and serve for a longer term."

Lee said the residents would likely be in their final or second-to-final year of their residency – or "very close to fully trained."

If the program goes forward, Lee said, resident physicians will gather information from the community – including from Native health facilities – as they craft what he called "teaching cases." The teaching case, he said, would be a 15- to 20-page document with graphs or pictures that lets readers understand how care is given and spark discussion about that care

"There's so much complexity here, and we want to challenge the ideas that one size can fit all, especially as we move toward health reform," Lee said.

PLANT

A growing backlash has some tribal leaders questioning whether the health and environmental risks associated with energy production has put their people in harm's way.

Across the country, a disproportionate number of power plants operate near or on tribal lands. NV Energy maintains its plant near the Moapa Paiute reservation is safe and has been upgraded with the required clean emissions technologies.

Meanwhile, local, state and federal health agencies say they cannot conduct accurate health studies to verify the tribe's complaints because the sample size would be too small.

In all, about 10 percent of all power plants operate within 20 miles of reservation land, according to an Associated Press analysis of data from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. Many of those 51 energy production centers are more than a half-century old and affect roughly 48 tribes living on 50 reservations. Fewer than 2 percent of all people in the United States identify as Native American and only a small portion live on tribal land.

In many cases, Native American leaders have long embraced energy development as an economic opportunity for communities battling widespread unemployment.

But a growing backlash has some tribal leaders questioning whether the health and environmental risks associated with energy production has put their people in harm's way. While it's not conclusive that coal operations pose a direct danger to reservation residents, the Moapa Paiutes are one of several tribes demanding the closure of their neighborhood power plants.

Sherry Smith, a history professor who co-edited the book "Indians and Energy: Exploitation and Opportunity in the American Southwest," said hardly anyone paid attention or were aware of potential environmental consequences when the power plants were built decades

"These are not simply people who have been duped by the government or the energy corporations," said Smith, director of the William P. Clements Center for Southwest Studies at Southern Methodist University in Texas. "They are simply 21st century people who are coping with the same issues the rest of us are about economic development and the environmental consequences and having to weigh these things."

Among the nation's 564 diverse tribal entities, energy production is widely debated. Many support environmental protections as a natural extension of American Indian values. But tribal leaders also aspire to protect their culture by keeping members on the reservation. Jobs and economic opportunity are necessary, energy production proponents say, and power plants fill the gap.

On one end of the spectrum is the Navajo Nation, the country's largest reservation, with five power plants near or on its sprawling territory in the Southwest. The tribe has embraced coal production as a central component of its economy, and Navajo officials traveled to Washington in June to oppose proposed EPA regulations to make the plants more environmentally sound. The new requirements would kill jobs, tribal leaders said.

On the other side of the debate have been members of tribes such as the Moapa Paiutes and the Northern Cheyenne of Montana, which for years blamed local energy companies for the health woes plaguing residents on their reservations.

In Moapa, Yvette Chevalier said she became ill within weeks of moving last year to the reservation, which sits 2 miles from the decadesold coal plant that sometimes infuses nearby skies with gray fumes. Gary Lee said he recently lost 40 pounds because of health troubles.

Former Tribal Chairman Vernon Lee said it's not unusual for members to be hospitalized.

"There have been a lot of heart attacks," Lee said. "Many young people died."

When coal is burned, carbon dioxide, sulfur dioxide, nitrogen oxides and mercury compounds are released into the air, according to the EPA. Research has shown those fine particles can be linked to serious health problems, including premature death.

Children, who breathe more often, and senior citizens, who tend to have health problems agitated by pollution, are particularly vulnerable, said Colleen McKaughan, an associate director in the EPA's air division.

In Montana, the Northern Cheyenne live near the state's largest coal-power plant, the Colstrip Steam Plant. The four-unit power plant operated by PPL Montana produces 2,200 megawatts of electricity and is one of the largest employers in eastern Montana with roughly 400 workers. Many in the tribe want it shut down.

In northeastern Utah, the Ute Indian Tribe has threatened to sue Deseret Power over pollution from its 30-year-old plant on the reservation, which generates 500-megawatts of electricity. Ozone readings in the region can reach nearly twice the limit considered safe by the EPA, especially during winter months.

"They are legitimately concerned about the impact the power plant has on the reservation," said Michael Harris, a lawyer representing the tribe.

Harris said some tribal members have complained of asthma attacks and cancer clusters and the plant might be to blame. Deseret Power did not respond to a request for

To be sure, tribes fighting energy companies are the exceptions.

The massive Four Corners Steam Plant sits on Navajo land in Fruitland, N.M., where the Arizona Public Service Company says it generates 2,040 megawatts of electricity and serves New Mexico, Arizona, California and Texas.

Tribal members who work at the power plants earn roughly triple the average Navajo family income of about $20,000 per year. The tribe expects to receive more than $7 million annually from the two power plants on its land under its latest lease proposals.

"A lot of our own people who are critical of coal are not understanding the economic benefits," said Stephen Etsitty, executive director of the Navajo Nation Environmental Protection Agency. "It's easy to perceive a problem when you see a big power plant smoke stack ... but that often causes you not to look at other areas of concern."

In Moapa, Simmons – whose 31-year-old brother passed away after working at Reid Gardner Generating Station – can see the Nevada power plant from her kitchen window. It reminds her of her brother's death.

She also frets for her 24-year-old son, who works at the plant and comes home with ash-covered skin. His wife is pregnant with Simmon's first grandchild.

"The land is poisoned," she said. "I don't even open my window because I don't like to look at it."

6 lines your boss should never cross

Unacceptable Employment Scenarios and What To Do If They Occur

DETROIT – Most working adults have experienced an uncomfortable situation at work; that's the reality of interpersonal relationships in a professional setting. However, while no work situation is perfect in every respect, your workplace should be more positive than negative, and never a place where you feel distressed or ill at ease the majority of the time.

This can be difficult if you have a boss who frequently crosses the line of professional behavior, according to the employment experts at Allison & Taylor Reference Checking.

Your boss is crossing the line if he/she:

1. Makes references to your salary in front of other staff. This is private and confidential information, not public. Other employees don't need to know what you're being paid, and it's true regardless of the type of comment that's made. Whether the boss is saying, "I don't pay you enough," or "I pay you too much," this type of comment will lead to resentment among staff members. Broadcasting your earnings undermines your position with the rest of the staff. They'll either think you're willing to work for peanuts, ruining their chances of earning more, or that you're overpaid.

2. Reprimands you in front of other employees. This is a form of bullying, and it's never acceptable. While you may have made a mistake or error that deserves discussion, a good employer will handle this professionally - and in private. A good boss should never denigrate your skills, either, with comments like, "This job is so easy, anyone could do it."

3. Has expectations.

Managers need to communicate their expectations for work performance clearly, assist employees when needed, and set reasonable deadlines for projects. This one can be tricky... at times every employee has probably felt that he or she been dealt an impossible task. But if you're consistently receiving demands, unreasonable you need to speak up. It could be a communication issue; perhaps something as simple as unclear directions are bogging you down. Or it could be a case of micromanagement (in which case, you were hired because the boss felt you were qualified to do your job, and it's fine to remind him/her to let you do it). Just be sure you address it in a courteous and non-confrontational manner.

4. Shares too many personal details. This is a work situation, not the therapist's couch. A good boss shouldn't share problems or inappropriate personal details. If you find the conversation often veers in this direction, lead the way by being very brief in your responses and then change the subject back to business. And don't bring your own problems to the office.

5. Makes inappropriate references. Any comment that makes you squirm is one that shouldn't have been made in the office. This includes water cooler jokes, emails, or comments about your physical appearance. Include in this category any type of implication that the boss is interested in a relationship of a personal nature, even if it's not something you're entirely opposed to. Workplace romances are NEVER a good idea, and it's beyond unprofessional to even make the suggestion. All of these things are a sexual

6. Implies that sex, race, age or religion is a factor in work performance. None of these things have anything to do with your ability to do the job you were hired for. The suggestion that it might is not only unfair, it's discriminatory. Address any such implication immediately.

If you find that you're experiencing one or more of these problems with regularity, you need to speak to your boss about your discomfort. This isn't always an easy thing to do, but it's necessary to maintain a professional working relationship. Keep in mind that he/she may not even be aware that it is bothering you. The key is to open up a dialogue that can deal with the issues. Approach your boss in a free, calm moment, and let him or her know that you feel there are some issues that need to be addressed. Then calmly discuss the issues; discuss the problem in an open and honest manner. And always keep in mind, that having respect for yourself and your needs will allow the boss to see you're there to do your best work. If discussing with your boss does not change things for the better, then consider going up the chain of command or to HR for help.

Nearly 16% of the Native American population aged 16 years and older are veterans.

From the World War II era to 2001, the United States military withheld state income tax from the paychecks of Native American service members who claimed Indian land as their home. ## Otoe-Missouria Summer Encampment July 19-22

HEATHER PAYNE

Otoe-Missouria Press Release

RED ROCK, Okla. - In today's digital age, life has a way of distracting us. We text and Google and Facebook our lives to the world, but we rarely stop to take a moment to think about our place in it. We move so fast that we don't take root, but a tree without deep roots cannot stand. Each year, the Otoe-Missouria Tribe gathers on the third weekend of July to slow down, reminisce, teach and take root.

For 131 years, the people have gathered near the Old Agency in Red Rock to celebrate and remember their Otoe-Missouria ways. For many people the gathering, held this year July 19-22, is the most significant social and cultural event of the year.

Encampment Committee Chairman Hank Childs welcomes those tribal members to enjoy the four day event. He says that he understands that people sometimes have to move away, as he did many years ago, but they should not forget they are Otoe-Missouria people.

"The ones that moved away, like my back," Childs says. "Come back, dance. Meet your family. Introduce your in and all the trees are strong." children into the arena. Catch up with old friends."

For his part, Childs says he was schooled on the ways of the Otoe-Missouria encampment by elders who wanted to ensure that practices and traditions were carried out properly. Today, he is the elder who must pass on the customs of his people to the next generation.

"It is handed down to us through all days. these years and we try to keep it our way," Childs says. "Sometimes you go to different powwows and see how other tribes do it and you wonder why Otoes do it differently. We do it our way. We do it the Otoe way."

This spring the Encampment Grounds flooded when Red Rock Creek broke its banks after days of heavy rains. This was not the first time the river had flooded the campgrounds, but after two years of enduring drought and temperatures over 100 degrees at Encampment, Childs looks at the flooding as a good sign.

"We needed the rain," Childs says. Trees around the arena broke last year because it was so dry. They just came family, to get a better life because there crashing down onto peoples camps. ### Tribal clinic refusing chronic care service to non-tribal citizens

■ An official says the tribe puts in three times the money they get from IHS and a tight economy was a factor in the decision.

S.E. RUCKMAN Native American Times Special Contributor

CAPE FLORAL, Fla. - Kay Haering gets up every morning and checks her blood sugar before breakfast. Her insulin level will determine what she eats for breakfast. A diabetic, she learned how to eat for her chronic disease at a local Indian clinic in nearby Immokalee, Fla.

Beginning in July, Haering, a member of the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma, is among those whose care is restricted for non-Seminoles at their health clinics. The Seminole Tribe of Florida notified Haering that Immokalee patients termed "Direct Care Patient" will no longer have chronic health care at the facility.

In a letter from Seminole Tribe of Florida to Haering, the facility outlined that it will be able to provide limited dental care and acute care for illnesses that are short term, but not care for those with diseases like arthritis, heart problems or diabetes.

WASHINGTON (AP) - A bill giving Native American tribes authority over agreements to lease their lands for development awaits the president's signature.

Dance has always been an important part of Osage life and culture. Now it will be used to share the tribe's history with the rest of the world.

In the Art of Motion Dance Studio in Bartlesville, Randy Tinker Smith listens to the music of Wahzhazhe, a new ballet to premiere in Tulsa Aug. 3. It's playing over the speaker in the next room where dancers learn the choreography of a village scene.

Wahzhazhe began with music, said director and producer Randy Tinker Smith. Two years ago, she worked at the Osage Tribal Museum in Pawhuska. Researcher Lou Brock had written eight songs and occasionally played them at work.

"When I heard it, I thought immediately, 'That needs to be a ballet," Tinker Smith said.

The ballet will be at 8 p.m. Aug. 3-4 at Holland Hall in Tulsa and 8 p.m. Aug. 10-11 at the Bartlesville Community Center.

As a researcher, Tinker Smith has seen many historical texts of the history of the Osage. The word "Wahzhazhe" is what the people call themselves and it roughly means "people of the middle water."

The tribe was known to have lived throughout an expansive portion of the Ohio River valley area before Iroquois tribes began to push the Osage westward. The tribe migrated to a region touching present-day Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) -The U.S. Department of Justice is supporting Native American inmates in their lawsuit challenging South Dakota's ban on tobacco in religious Inmates Blaine Brings Plenty and Clayton Creek in their 2009 federal lawsuit against the South Dakota Department of Corrections contend that a prison policy that bans the use of tobacco during religious ceremonies is discriminatory. The state said ceremonial to bacco inside the state penitentiary was becoming increasingly abused, and the policy is not overly restrictive because it allows other botanicals such as red willow bark to be burned.

The Justice Department, in a brief filed late last Friday, said the state's position runs contrary to the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act and U.S. Supreme Court precedent.

"The court should decline this invitation to determine the importance of tobacco use to practitioners of Native American religions," the Justice Department attorneys wrote.

"Accordingly, the court should also reject defendants' argument that they have not placed a substantial burden on plaintiffs' religious exercise."

The South Dakota prison system went tobacco-free in 2000 but made an exception for tobacco used in Native American ceremonies. But officials in October 2009 eliminated that exemption, saying tobacco was being sold or bartered and inmates had been caught separating it from their pipe mixtures and prayer ties.

Victim specialists urge teamwork on Indian cases

DAVE KOLPACK Associated Press

FARGO, N.D. (AP) – Federal prosecutors said last week they're heeding the call for teamwork by victim specialists who handle child abuse and neglect cases on American Indian reservations.

Experts told attendees at a conference on family violence in Indian country that successful prosecution for crimes against children depends on cooperation among law enforcement, social workers, doctors and attornevs.

"It takes a lot of people to be able to make this work," said Joan Halvorson, a Native American victim specialist with the FBI.

Rick Volk, an assistant U.S. attorney from North Dakota, said in an interview Wednesday that is office has for several years led regular meetings on the reservations with agency representatives to review child abuse cases. The sessions have become "more of a priority" in the last few years, he said.

"Essentially, we determine what's been reported, what's going on with the case, what needs to be done yet, and where it's at in the process to make sure there aren't those falling through the cracks,"

Panelists said Wednesday networking among agencies can help with simple problems, such as finding addresses for a victim or figuring out who has legal custody of the child, or with more complex cultural issues, such as use of traditional Native American healing methods in medical care.

"It's very important we find out the needs of that particular reservation," Halvorson said. "All of them are a little different."

Halvorson said that while face-to-face contact with the victims and their families is essential, several prefer to conduct interviews off the reservation "so the rumor mill doesn't start, as in any small community."

Dr. Arne Graff, of the Fargobased Sanford Child Advocacy Center, told the group of police officers, social workers, prosecutors, counselors and community leaders from North Dakota, South Dakota and Minnesota that healing is a long and involved process.

"Mostly what I want you to take away is this: Caring for these kids is a team effort," Graff said. "There is no one person in this room who has any more power or need for these kids than the entire team."

Prosecutors warn about human trafficking

■ American Indian girls are particularly at risk.

FARGO, N.D. (AP) - Top federal prosecutors from North and South Dakota have added human trafficking to their list of crimes affecting Native Americans at an increased rate in the U.S. attorneys Brendan Johnson of South Dakota and Timothy Purdon of North Dakota said during a conference on family violence last Tuesday that both states are seeing more cases of girls and young women being recruited for prostitution and drug rings.

Three new indictments for human trafficking have been handed down in South Dakota in the last three months, Johnson said.

"You have people who treat their victims like they're not humans," Johnson said after talking to a group that included police, social workers, prosecutors, counselors and community

The operations are formed mainly in populated areas, but American Indian girls are particularly at risk, the prosecutors said. Some of them were recruited by a Sioux Falls-area man who was convicted last year of sex trafficking

"These young girls were brutalized. They were humiliated," Johnson said.

Brandon Thompson, 28, of Tea, S.D., was sentenced to life in prison on the sex trafficking charge.

"This is one area where the federal government has gotten it right," Johnson said of the penalty.

A recent sex trafficking case in North Dakota involved several victims from the Fort Berthold Reservation. Dustin Morsette, 22, of New Town, was convicted of sex trafficking, sexual abuse, drug trafficking and witness tampering. He is awaiting sentencing.

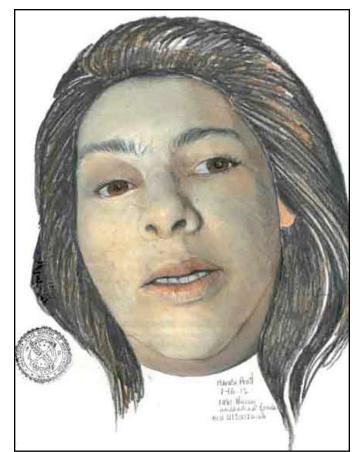

Authorities said Morsette recruited minors and young adults to be part of a gang he described as the Black Disciples. He allegedly forced gang members to distribute marijuana for him and engage in sex acts with him.

One of the investigators in that case, Bureau of Indian Affairs agent Mike White, said the increase in oil workers has added to worries about sex trafficking. But he said recent convictions on human trafficking and other violent crime has made victims and others more willing to help law enforcement.

"I have hope. I've seen it already," White said in an interview last week. "Once they know people are being prosecuted, they are coming forward."

Purdon, the U.S. attorney from North Dakota, said the campaign against violent crime on the reservation is a long process. He noted that an American Indian woman born in the United States has a 1-in-3 chance of being sexually assaulted in her lifetime.

"Improving public safety in Indian country is not something you are going to knock out in two years," he said. "If we can sustain this for a period of years, I am hopeful, I am confident, we can impact some of these statistics we find to be unacceptable."

Lakota man sues S. Dakota hospital over surgical scars

the letters KKK were carved into his stomach during surgery has filed a federal civil rights lawsuit against the South Dakota hospital where the operation took place, the hospital's board of directors and others.

YouTube videos featuring 69-year-old Vern Traversie, a Lakota man who lives on the Cheyenne River Reservation, went viral in Native American communities earlier this year. In them, Traversie talks about being mistreated at the hospital and shows his abdomen. Though he himself is blind, Traversie says he was told by others that the scars left after his heart surgery form the letters.

A May rally in support of Traversie said his story exemplifies the racism Native Americans experience in Rapid investigated his allegations and hospital officials. No criminal charges have been filed in the case.

Chase Iron Eyes, a lawyer for Traversie, filed a lawsuit Monday in U.S. District Court in South Dakota against Rapid City Regional Hospital, its board of directors, physicians and TRS Surg Assist Inc. The lawsuit alleges a civil rights violation based on race and cites the scarring from Traversie's double-bypass surgery done in August 2011 as evidence. It seeks a jury trial and damages.

"Defendants injured, carved, burned, and/or cared for Plaintiff's abdomen in such a manner that scars resembling three letters 'K' were permanently placed drew hundreds of people, many of whom on Plaintiff's abdomen for no medically necessary purpose or reason, and in the process injured, carved, burned, and/ SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) - A lawyer City. But others say they can't make or cared for other portions of Plaintiff's for a Native American man who claims out the letters, including police who body to cause injury, specifically his abdomen and back," the lawsuit stated.

Tim Sughrue, chief executive of Rapid City Regional Hospital, said in a statement that the hospital will "vigorously defend this claim."

"We at Rapid City Regional Hospital are confident the care we provide meets or exceeds standards of care and is without bias or consideration of race, religion, color, age, sex, disability, national origin, or any other classification protected by law," he said.

Traversie said he hadn't been aware the lawsuit was filed Monday, although he knew a lawyer was planning to file one at some point on his behalf.

"I think the Native people have been fighting racial hatred for many years in South Dakota, but you know, it's not all the people that are hateful toward Native Americans," said Traversie, who recently had another heart surgery in Bismarck, N.D. "We have a good segment of our society – white society – in South Dakota that are Christian people and they get along good with the Native Americans. In my instance, I believe I'm dealing with the Ku Klux Klan, and that's a small minority."

Iron Eyes, a member of the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe, and Cody Hall, a member of the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe, which Traversie belongs to, organized the May rally in an effort to bring attention to what they say is continued mistreatment of Native American people. Iron Eyes declined to comment about the lawsuit.

While Traversie's story spurred the protest, many Native Americans who attended referred to broken treaties, unsolved murders and incarceration rates among Native Americans as their reasons for showing up. They included Dennis Banks, who helped found the American Indian Movement in the late 1960s to protest the U.S. government's treatment of Indians and demand the government honor its treaties with Indian tribes.

South Dakota Attorney General Marty Jackley said last Tuesday that his office would release information in the "near future" about its investigation.

Fla tribe accuses former chairman of $26M theft

MIAMI (AP) - A Florida Indian tribe has accused its former chairman of stealing $26 million from its members to spend on gambling trips, shopping sprees, real estate and luxury cars.

In a federal lawsuit filed in Miami federal court, the Miccosukee tribe accuses Billy Cypress of conspiring to hide the "massive web of financial theft, embezzlement and fraud."

Cypress served as the tribe's chairman from 1987 until he was voted out in 2009.

The lawsuit also lists two former Miccosukee financial officers, two former U.S. attorneys and a Miami brokerage firm as defendants. One of the former Miccosukee financial officers, Julio Martinez, tells The Miami Herald that the tribal council under Cypress' leadership was fully aware of his spending.

The Herald could not reach Cypress or his attorneys for comment at press time.

Shoshone-Paiute leader sentenced on theft charges

BOISE, Idaho (AP) - The former chairman of a tribe in Idaho and Nevada will spend nearly a year under the supervision of the federal Bureau of Prisons after pleading guilty to theft.

A federal judge has recommended 38-year-old Kyle Prior of Caldwell serve his time at a residential reentry center in southwestern Idaho.

Prior, a former chairman of the Shoshone-Paiute Tribes in southern Idaho and northern Nevada, was also ordered to pay nearly $36,500 in restitution at his sentencing Tuesday.

Prior was executive director of the Upper Snake River Tribes Foundation from September 2008 and July 2009. It was during that time that prosecutors say he stole money intended to help enact a fish and wildlife program.

Prior pleaded guilty in January to using a foundation debit card to enrich himself.

No answers in killing of 2 kids on reservation

PATRICK SPRINGER AND CHUCK HAGA

Forum Communications

ST. MICHAEL, N.D. (AP) - Family and friends searched several days for Destiny DuBois and her little brother Travis DuBois Jr., after the children were reported missing by their father.

Their mother, Mena Shaw, decided to go to the home where she had lived with the children's father. Some said the couple had recently separated; others that they recently had reconciled.

Immediately entering, the mother knew something was terribly wrong - witnesses would later describe areas inside the house as covered with blood, some of it in pools.

In one bedroom, small bloody handprints later were found on a wall a couple of feet above the floor.

The search ended when Shaw found the lifeless bodies of 9-year-old "Des" and "Baby Trav," 6, under a mattress. Authorities said the children appeared to have been dead several days, slain by a knife or another cutting weapon.

The same day the bodies were found - May 21, 2011 – the children's father, Travis DuBois, was arrested and taken into custody. He pleaded guilty to public intoxication and reckless endangerment, according to a tribal prosecutor, and remains in jail serving sentences for those charges.

Now the search here on the Spirit Lake Nation is for answers to crimes that shook the community and have been cited as a grave example of endangered children on the reservation.

Almost 14 months later, nobody has been charged in connection with the siblings' deaths, and people wait anxiously for investigators to produce results.

"It's really sad that we have these two children murdered and who's going to pay for it?" asked Cheryl Good Iron, a grandmother who resides in Fort Totten, expressing a common sentiment on this Dakota Sioux reservation. "Who's going to be charged for it?"

Federal authorities insist that the investigation, jointly conducted by the FBI and Bureau of Indian Affairs police, has not stalled and remains on track.

"We've been working very hard on this case since the day it happened," said Timothy Purdon, the U.S. attorney for North Dakota, whose office would prosecute the case. "A great deal of forensic evidence has been gathered in the investigation, and some of that forensic evidence is still being processed."

He would not say whether investigators collected DNA evidence, though he said it is standard procedure for the FBI to do so, and added: "The FBI and BIA have conducted numerous interviews." Purdon declined to say whether investigators have identified any suspects in the case. He said he understands the frustration at Spirit Lake, and the need for information, but that he can say little about an ongoing investigation.

The BIA declined to comment, deferring to the FBI. A spokesman for the FBI, agent Kyle Loven, was tight-lipped.

"We are looking into this," he said. "It is an active investigation, and we are moving forward. I can't give any details."

Betty Jo Krenz was the Spirit Lake tribe's child case worker on call the weekend the DuBois children's bodies were found. Her phone rang a few minutes before 4 p.m. on a Saturday afternoon. She rushed to the home in St. Michael, where police and ambulance crews already were on the scene.

Krenz was called in to take care of the mother's other children - including a 4-yearold boy who was in the house when the bodies were found.

"They were really shaken," she said of the mother's several teenage daughters. "They were hysterical."

Inside the house, Krenz saw a lot of blood, including areas that looked like a paint can had spilled.

"It was a brutal way to die," she said. "The girls told me they fought hard. They watched their mom cradle those dead kids."

The floors were strewn with empty bottles and clutter.

"It looked like there had been a three-day party or a frat house party," Krenz said, adding that she'd heard that people had been in and out of the house before the bodies were found.

As neighbors began to gather outside the home, BIA and FBI investigators told Krenz, who no longer works for the tribe, to take the children to the nearby St. Michael recreation center, which has shower rooms.

There, she washed blood off the boy, and gathered the bloody clothing in plastic bags, which she gave to an aunt to be washed.

More than a year later, she hasn't heard anything from investigators or prosecutors.

"There's no closure for me," Krenz said, "and I can't imagine how the family feels."

Travis DuBois, an army veteran who worked for the reservation's fire department, has misdemeanor convictions for drunken driving and simple assault. The tribal prosecutor said he was intoxicated when taken into custody.

Mena Shaw also has had a few scrapes with the law. Her record in state court includes misdemeanor convictions for possession of a controlled substance and drug paraphernalia.

Nothing has been heard publicly from DuBois since he was taken into custody. He has served about half of his consecutive sentences, which total two years and two months, for public intoxication and reckless endangerment. Forum Communications reporters were unable to speak to DuBois in the Lake Region Corrections Facility, where he is being held.

His mother, Violet Robertson, said nobody on her side of the family has been interviewed by investigators. Her family is as bewildered as everyone else.

"We know nothing," she said. "Maybe people think we do. We know nothing."

The family can't afford to hire a lawyer, and Robertson said she didn't know if her son has legal representation.

She last saw her two DuBois grandchildren just days before they were found dead. They were in a program at the Four Winds School.

Destiny, whose family said she loved school, had just completed third grade. Translated, her Dakota name was Many Stars Woman.

Travis Jr., who had been born premature and was small for his age, had finished first grade. His Dakota name was Walking Elk Boy. His uncle, Burton "B.J." Robertson, thought of his diminutive nephew as a little warrior.

"I know in my heart I couldn't believe my son would do something like this," Violet Robertson said, her eyes welling with tears. "He took care of his kids.

"They're saying he was a meth head. He didn't do stuff like that. He worked," she said.

A friend gave her a piece of paper retrieved from the house, a note in large printed letters Robertson said was written in Destiny's penmanship.

"My dad is the best dad and he will always be," the note said, with a heart shape as a period. "The best dad."

Robertson, like so many at Spirit Lake, is left wondering what happened in that home to those two children, and by whose hands.

"I want answers," she said.

illnesses - diabetes and polymyalgia (arthritis-related illness). Haering and patients like her "will no longer be eligible to receive treatment and annual maintenance prescriptions at Seminole Tribe of Florida Health Clinic for chronic medical conditions," Connie Whidden, the Seminole Tribe of Florida's (STOF) health director, stated in the letter.

Whidden said the tribe gave it plenty of thought before they decided to discontinue services to even one group. She said the numbers are high for the amount of people who will be affected by their policy change but added that a tighter economy was a factor in the decision.

"The tribe puts in three times what we get from IHS (Indian Health Service)," Whidden said. "A lot of nonresidents reside in the state of Florida. They feel like Seminoles are rich they can provide services. Our tribe doesn't think so."

Meanwhile, Haering said the cut backs are severe for non-Seminoles.

"If it's not a cold, flu or ant bite, we're not going to be seen in the clinic," Haering said.

Haering, a semi-retired real estate agent, lives about 40 miles from the southern Florida Seminole health facility and the loss of her chronic care means no more diabetic supplies, blood work and related consultation (foot care and dietitian). She cannot afford a supplementary insurance policy for $370 a month that could cover her expenses, she said.

In the notification letter to Haering, Whidden stated that all of her medical records would be available on request  $and \, upon \, completion \, of a \, STOF \, records$ release form. The letter outlined chronic illnesses as any medical condition requiring management over time.

"Therefore, you need to locate another medical provider and/or facility which will be able to treat you for your chronic disease and you must pay for the medical care that you receive," Whidden stated.

Confused by her pending lack of services, Haering said that she wrote several letters to Seminole for answers but received no response. In her letter from Seminole Tribe of Florida, Haering was referred to area county health facilities for health care. Haering said she contacted IHS for help. IHS officials in Nashville, Tenn. told her in a June 8 letter they were reviewing the

"It is a complex issue due to the fact that the Seminole Tribe owns and operates their health program under Title V of Public Law 93-638," said Martha Ketcher, acting area director. "It will take some time to investigate the issue, and will probably require review by the Office of General Counsel."

IHS officials said they would not respond regarding specific tribes but recognized tribes "going 638" for health care programs. According to IHS statistics, more than half of the IHS budget authority appropriation is administered by tribes. This is done primarily through Self-Determination contractsorSelf-Governancecompacts. Nationally, there are roughly 82 Title V compacts totaling approximately $1.35 billion. So while Seminole is exercising provisions under Title V, some Indian patients may find themselves out of the health care loop.

"We didn't say we were cutting services completely, just we no longer provide certain services," Whidden said.

Whidden added that future revisions in their policy may be to allow children of descendents who do not fulfill their one-quarter blood quantum requirement for enrollment access to health care in their facilities.

"You can't throw the baby out with the bath water," she added.

Meanwhile, Haering said she will probably return to selling real estate soon. She needs to find insurance that covers her health care needs and maintains she would have not dropped her insurance while still "healthy" if she knew she could not count on care through IHS in her area. The thought crosses her mind that she is being forgotten by Indian Health Services, she said.

"They (IHS) are not offering anything of value to these Native American patients here in Florida," Haering said.

Natives aim to fight cancer through art

"One of the biggest risk factors for cancer is getting older. Decades back, Native folks never lived long enough to get cancer," said Kris Rhodes, executive director of the American Indian Cancer Foundation in Minneapolis.

JON WALKER Argus Leader

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) -Specialists in Native American health are turning to art to correct a problem in medicine.

The problem is cancer, the leading cause of death among all South Dakotans and a greater menace to Indians in particular.

A project called Circle of Life will take root this fall as an attempt to close that gap in cancer care. Sponsors will use Native art, stories from survivors and lessons on nutrition, exercise and screenings as online tool kits to encourage healthier living among tribes. The larger society has been saturated with anti-cancer messages since the 1960s, but the voices in this project are new and exclusively Native American.

"This is cancer education for Native Americans by Native Americans," said Charlotte Hofer, spokeswoman for the American Cancer Society, which is sponsoring the project.

The curriculum will be available at cancer.org as a resource for what Hofer calls "a positive, holistic message based on common tribal values of spirituality and respect for the natural world." She expects community leaders and school teachers to use it in seminars and classrooms and for individuals to do the same online.

The effort rises out of a knotty health challenge. Half of South Dakota's Indians smoke, a rate three times worse than the full population and a leading indicator of cancer. Indians are more obese, eat less nutritiously, get less exercise and see doctors less often, all factors in causing cancer or failing to catch it before it grows out of control. They develop the disease more often, and they have a death rate, at 252 per 100,000, that is 37 percent higher than cancer mortality for whites. On top of that, they've had to deal with a reluctance to face the problem in their own tribes and external challenges that keep rural Indians at a medical disadvantage.

"We do less cancer screening because we're underfunded, and the result is we do not have the services that are considered standard for others. When you diagnose it later, people die," said Dr. Donald Warne, a senior policy adviser to the Great Plains Tribal Chairmen's Health Board and a consultant to Sanford

Cancer is becoming a more visible problem, ironically, at a time tribes are seeing a gain in life expectancy. Average lifespan moved from 78 to 80 overall for South Dakota in a decade ending in 2007, and tribal people specifically jumped from the 50s to the mid-60s. Efforts to cut drinking on reservations had a hand in that, as did progress in reducing deaths to pneumonia and influenza.

But living longer has its side effects, and one of them is cancer.

"One of the biggest risk factors for cancer is getting older. Decades back, Native folks never lived long enough to get cancer," said Kris Rhodes, executive director of the American Indian Cancer Foundation in Minneapolis.

The power of imaging is central to the Circle of Life, with the color illustrations, photography and text from and for Indians. It is to be a work of art with personal impact, no small matter for minorities often left at the margins of health messages.

"If you're from the majority society, and people all look like you, you don't even think about that," said Warne a South Dakota native and member of the Oglala Lakota tribe. "But if you're not from the majority society, you start to wonder if this is for me. Health messaging is more effective when it's culturally tailored and culturally appropriate and when the messenger is from the same cultural group as the person receiving the messages."

Success in this case will require a shift of opinion on smoking, a greater openness to health screening and a willingness to get past a barrier to acknowledge a problem. Roberta Cahill, director of community partnerships for the American Cancer Society in Pierre and a Yankton Sioux member in her 60s, said tribal people for years have had trouble owning the "People did not talk about cancer much," Cahill said. "A lot of time people were unaware of others who had survived cancer. In other instances, there's a belief if you talk about something it's going to happen. It's been a very difficult topic to bring up in communities."

Smoking complicates the challenge. Indians use traditional tobacco in spiritual ceremonies, which is distinct from the addictive commercial tobacco people smoke for periodic pleasure. It's the commercial tobacco that now plagues Indian country with a 49.9 percent smoking rate, in contrast to the steadily falling 15.3 percent rate for whites in South Dakota. The government might have had a hand in this disparity by sending surplus smokes to the tribes after World War II and thus fostering an addiction for huge numbers of

"It is definitely the social norm to smoke. It's the affordable luxury when there are high rates of poverty. The cultural context is huge," said Rhodes from the cancer foundation. Rhodes, 43, from the Anishinaabe tribe in northern Minnesota, experienced it herself. "I smoked as the thing to do in high school and college. Then I just quit. I was one of the lucky people," she said. She later taught tobacco control classes in Indian country and found the social connection to other smokers the hardest link to break. The new curriculum will need to finesse the point.

"Messages around tobacco need to be sensitive to separate out the spiritual use. When it's our most sacred medicine, you can't just say 'tobacco kills.' It takes a bit more messaging than that."

The effort comes alongside state health department efforts to make breast, cervical and colon cancer screening accessible to all residents and as the major health system try to cover more rural areas.

"There's a lot to be learned," Rhodes said. "For too long Native folks weren't at the table. Now with Circle of Life we are engaging communities to ask the question, what's not working and what needs to be changed."

National American Indian Housing Council and many tribal leaders, the bill passed with unanimous support in both the House and Senate, such incredible support and many sponsors on both sides of the aisle."

The Interior Secretary still must approve the tribes' leasing regulations. The bill does not apply to oil and gas leases. The administration issued new leasing regulations last November that set deadlines for approval of leases to end long delays.

The House approved the bill in May. The Senate approved it July 17 by voice vote. The president's signature would make it law.

Other states, including Nevada and New Mexico, have prison smoking bans but allow Native Americans to use tobacco during religious ceremonies.

Native American Council of Tribes sued, arguing that for Native American prayer to be effective, it must be embodied in tobacco and offered within a ceremonial framework.

Brings Plenty and Moore in their suit said the policy change violates their U.S. Constitutional rights ensuring that no prisoner be penalized or discriminated against solely on their religious beliefs or practices.

Their attorney, Pamela Bollweg, argued before U.S. District Judge Karen Schreier in March that prison officials have to show there's a compelling interest in limiting access, and even if there is a compelling interest they have to use the James Moore, the attorney representing prison officials, argued that South Dakota's policy change followed more than 10 years of conversations with tribal elders and traditional healers, some of whom perform pipe ceremonies without tobacco. He said prison officials stopped short of banning the use of pipes.

Moore did not immediately return a phone call seeking comment on the Justice Department's intervention.

governments on a single reservation. While other reservations in the country are home to more than one tribe, officials have said the Wind River Indian Reservation is the only case where two tribes with separate governments share common ground.

"The Eastern Shoshone Tribe is the only tribe with aboriginal ties to this region, including all areas within the Wind River Indian Reservation," wrote Kimberly Varilek, attorney general for the Eastern Shoshone Tribe and a member of the tribe.

"And the Northern Arapaho Tribe can neither demonstrate that same interest, nor any other reason why their permit can only be satisfied on the Wind River Indian Reservation in complete disregard of the Eastern Shoshone Tribe's interests, beliefs, traditions and practices," Varilek wrote in the brief she filed Friday in federal court in Cheyenne.

Varilek said Monday that the Arapaho could seek permission from the state of Wyoming to kill eagles outside the reservation.

Although the Shoshone use eagle feathers in their own ceremonies, Varilek said, "There's not a process in the Shoshone beliefs to kill eagles." She said the Shoshones traditionally captured live eagles, took some feathers, and then released the birds.

William C'Hair, a Northern Arapaho elder, said Monday that his response to the Eastern Shoshone Tribe's argument that it has deeper ties to the Wind River Reservation is that the Shoshone received full payment long ago from the federal in the reservation that went to the Northern Arapaho Tribe.

C'Hair said the federal government also docked payments it made to the Northern Arapaho Tribe for the loss of ancestral lands to recoup the cost of payments to the Eastern Shoshone Tribe. "So actually, we bought and we own the reservation. Bought and paid for," he said.

C'Hair noted that the federal government holds other reservation lands in trust for other tribes throughout Indian Country. "The federal government just loans them the land for them to reside on," he said. "But the Northern Arapaho Tribe owns this land. That is their property. And that is the way that I would respond."

The Northern Arapaho Tribe sued the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service last fall for a permit to kill bald eagles on the reservation for the tribe's Sun Dance. This spring, the federal agency issued a permit allowing the Arapaho to kill two eagles, the first of its kind ever issued to an American Indian tribe.

In specifying that the Northern Arapaho could only kill eagles off the reservation, the Fish and Wildlife Service stated it had conferred with the Eastern Shoshone and government for the one-half interest learned that tribal members were opposed to eagles being killed on the

The Fish and Wildlife Service stated in March that the Northern Arapaho wouldn't need permission from the State of Wyoming to kill eagles off the reservation with the federal permit. However state officials maintain state law prohibits killing eagles off the reservation.

U.S. District Judge Alan B. Johnson of Cheyenne is presiding over the Northern Arapaho Tribe's case against the federal agency. He signed an order in May allowing the Shoshone to intervene as a "friend of the court."

In his order allowing the Eastern Shoshone to enter the case, Johnson said the federal permit provisions left the Arapaho Tribe boxed in.

"(T)he permitted take area expressly excludes lands within the Wind River Indian Reservation, which is the only place in the State where Wyoming law criminalizing the taking of eagles does not apply," Johnson wrote. "The permit thus confoundingly allows the Northern Arapaho Tribe to take eagles only on lands where doing so is a criminal offense...."

Johnson noted that the federal permit would require the Northern Arapaho Tribe to follow state laws. Accordingly, he wrote, the federal permit "offers no real permission to take eagles at all." He has set a hearing for arguments in the case for Sept. 28.

The federal government in recent years prosecuted Winslow Friday, a young Northern Arapaho tribal member, who killed a bald eagle for use in the tribe's annual Sun Dance without a permit. Despite the tribe's legal support, Friday pleaded guilty after his case was transferred to tribal court, and he was ordered to pay a fine.

Andy Baldwin, lawyer for the Northern Arapaho Tribe, said last Tuesday that he believes the Shoshone Tribe's legal brief missed the point entirely. "This case is about the constitutional right of Northern Arapaho tribal members to the free exercise of religion," he said.

A few weeks ago we lost one of the original advocates for Native language preservation. His name was Tom Parsons. Tom was one of my best friends. My buddy Jerry Roybal told me in 1976 that I needed to meet this great guy who was working at Humboldt State University in Arcata, California. It was Tom. A few weeks later Jerry took me by to introduce me to Tom. It was a propitious meeting. I worked as a consultant for Tom for the next two years.

He was working to preserve the Tolowa, Hupa, Yurok, and Karuk languages. He had developed his own way of doing it. He was not a trained linguist, but he had developed a way of writing the languages down. I accompanied him to Karuk a couple of times and watched him work with the elders for a couple of hours

North vs. South: Ed Little Cook sets the record straight

RED ROCK, Okla. -Ed Little Cook has spent a lifetime singing and drumming at powwows. As younger generations step up to continue the tradition, he finds himself in the new role of educator.

A few years ago, the Ponca City resident read an article about powwow drumming - that healing beat and soul of the people. In the piece, a drummer from a northern tribe was quoted as saying there is a difference between northern and southern drumming.

"He made the statement that we (in the south) beat the drum four times through in the middle," Little Cook, Ponca, said. "We beat the drum hard three times. Everyone in Oklahoma does that."

In most songs played at powwows, the middle portion features a bar of distinctly harder drum beats. Ever since he read the article, Little Cook has wanted to set the record straight. Most southern Native American tribes will beat the drum hard only three times, and they are not "honor beats," as the same source called them. That's not to say that Ponca drummers don't get carried away from time to time.

"If the song is really good, say, there's a lot of spirit in the singing, one of the drummers might hit the drum really hard, and that would be strictly for emphasis. He's feeling good, feeling the spirit," he added.

Little Cook complaining. He only wants readers to know how he was taught to drum and how he has taught his son, Little Bear Little Cook.

At the recent annual Otoe-Missouri Encampment in the Red Rock community south remembers hearing of Ponca City, Little Bear Little Cook was honored as head war dance singer.

Ed Little Cook talks about the drum and singing during the annual Otoe-Missouria Encampment powwow in Red Rock. Okla.

Friday night, father joined son and the rest of the singers around the drum to play through the night under the summer sky, trees and along the encampment's branchladen arbors. When Little Cook talks of "spirit," he knows of what he speaks. Listening carefully, he closes his eyes to the drumming and singing as he participates and is caught up in the rhythm.

"We treat that drum just like a person. That's the heart beat of our people. We don't put that drum in the garage," he said. "... I was told by older people and grandpa that the drum can make you well. They used to take sick people to walk around the drum and get a blessing and healing." Little Cook elders who spread it through the southern half of the U.S. grandfather talk about the beginning of powwow in

"We brought the style of dancing and singing when we were brought to Oklahoma, when we were forcibly removed. What we call powwow today, we brought that to Oklahoma," he said.

When the tribe arrived in Oklahoma from its native lands in Nebraska, members shared their traditions with other tribes already removed to Indian Territory, Little Cook said.

"Nobody was dancing here," he added.

It all came from the White Eagle area, also south of Ponca City. In the early 1900s, the Ponca shared their songs and dance with other tribes suddenly displaced in Oklahoma. Elders were often invited to other communities to create songs for those tribes. When the Miller Brothers 101 Ranch near Ponca City created the 101 Ranch Wild West Show on the advice of neighbor and showman Pawnee Bill, powwow dance took another turn, he said.

Around the 1920s, the ranch featured Indian dancers suddenly dressed in regalia outside of the earthy color palette traditionally seen. Bustles were bigger and feathers more numerous and richly dyed. The flashier regalia created to attract tourists, Little Cook said, was the beginning of powwow's flamboyant fancy dancing.

Over the years, tribes and even clans have created their own songs and hallmarks. New dances were influenced by tribes from the north and south. The powwow spread and changed, and that's a good thing if it is to survive, Little Cook said.

"Everything evolves. It (powwow) may even evolve further. If I'm here (when it does), I may not even recognize it," he said. "We don't still ride horses and use teepees. We have doctors and lawyers now. But as long as the spirit is there, whatever you do, if done in the right spirit, can't go wrong."

Just don't tell him that the powwow came to Oklahoma by any other route. Little Cook is up for discussing powwow's origins in Oklahoma, "but no one can claim the dance. They have to come and tell us how they originated it," he said smiling.

"We don't have a lot of Osage history written by Osages," Tinker Smith said. "This is a really good way to teach our little ones; and they can see it up there, and start learning about who we are."

The story opens with a pre-European contact scene of village life. A boy and girl show interest in one another and the families come together to negotiate a marriage, which was mostly left to the uncles. The next scene shows Spanish and French military and settlers moving into the area and beginning to push the Osage even further west.

Successive scenes tell about Osage customs and socials, the Indian boarding schools; the oil years; the Osage Indian murders or "Reign of Terror," to honoring veterans and the state of walking in two worlds.

In 1871, the Osage had sold their last lands in Kansas and purchased land for their own reservation present day Osage County. The tribe lived in Indian Territory where other Native American tribes were being removed to from all over the country. Osage country, however, drastically changed after vast oil deposits were discovered. The tribe owned the land in common, although business was conducted by federally appointed agents. Allottees of the land and families with head rights to the mineral deposits underground soon found themselves overwhelmed with outsiders bringing business, alcohol and other influences to the reservation and its center, Pawhuska.

That stage of the ballet is set to ragtime-style music at a quicker tempo.

"It's really manic, because that's how Pawhuska was," Tinker Smith

Her father, Geoge Tinker, the son of an original allottee, was born in 1918. He remembered seeing fine houses go up in the present-day Osage Nation capital. He also saw traditional Osage longhouses in the backyards. Everyone wanted to do business with the Osage and would talk them into buying homes, cars and other luxuries, Tinker Smith

Pawhuska even had a Rolls Royce dealership, one of the first in the U.S., she said.

Those years, 1921-1925, were called the "Reign of Terror" because of a series of deaths within the tribe. White men would marry into families, and through a number of sudden deaths, they would inherit head rights to the land.

Tinker Smith said an FBI investigation uncovered a plot wherein a banker in Fairfax hired nephews and other men to marry Osage women, preferably those with children with head rights. They killed the women and the children and gained them all. Osage men were also victims. Later autopsies showed the people were killed by alcohol poisoning or gun shots in the head. Houses were even blown up.

The scene is meant to make the viewer understand the fear and loss, she said.

The final scenes show resilience and the people coming back through their traditions, including the tradition of caring for soldiers before and after war.

By telling this story as a ballet, Wahzhazhe also honors the art of dance in both ritual and as a legacy of two of the most famous ballet dancers in the world. Sisters Maria and Marjorie Tallchief were Osage and from the Gray Horse area. They were among the five Oklahoma Indian Ballerinas, each of whom became acclaimed on the world stage. The other ballerinas were the late Rosella Hightower (Choctaw), Yvonne Chouteau (Shawnee) and Tulsa Ballet co-founder Moscelyne Larkin (Peoria-Shawnee), who died in April.

"The Osage are about ballet with Marjorie and Maria Tall Chief," Tinker Smith said. "Little girls in Gray Horse grew up wanting to be ballerinas because that's where Maria and Marjorie are from. It's common in our tribe."

Smith, Ienna another Osage ballerina, is doing the choreography and leading the mix of professional and advanced student dancers through the steps. Smith, an Oral Roberts University graduate with a degree in dance education, is Tinker Smith's daughter. She came on board when funds were leaner and they needed to begin working on the project.

Concert and film composer Joseph Rivers, University of Tulsa Film Studies Department Chair and professor of music, worked with Brock to turn his eight songs into a symphony. Larkin's son, Roman Jasinski, formerly of Tulsa Ballet, joins the staff as artistic director.

Tinker Smith also credits the late Leonard Maker, Osage elder, and Kathryn Red Corn of the Osage Tribal Museum for their help in researching the project. Wendy Ponca and Terry Wann, Osage clothing designers, are working on the costumes. Alexandra Ponca is the set designer.

Tinker Smith said she also spoke with some 50 Osage elders.

"I wanted (their) permission if I could tell it, and what I could tell," she said.

Funded through a $50,000 grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, Wahzhazhe is also supported by a group of oil and gas exploration companies. Spyglass Energy Group, Nadel and Gussman and Michael L. Graves pooled together $50,000 toward the $300,000 production, and they offered a $50,000 match of other money contributed to the project by other oil companies. The project also receives support from Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, LLP, and from Osage, LLC, which operates the business enterprises of the Osage Nation.

The funds are crucial since Wahzhazhe is being created from scratch. Organizers receive donations through the Allied Arts and Humanities Council of Bartlesville, but thus far, Tinker Smith estimates more than 500 volunteer hours have gone into the ballet.

Some of the work has also been done by college interns working under mentors.

They're all driven to create a production unlike anything seen before, but Tinker Smith is encouraged by something more.

"What really drove me," she said, "one of our elders, who passed away a few months ago named Leonard Maker, said 'Randy, there's a little kid in California right now, and in 30 years he's going to look in the mirror and he's going to say, 'What does it mean to be Osage?' and he's going to be able to watch this ballet and see."

Senecas move to evict non-Indians

■ Seneca officials say only the Tribal Council has the power to grant permission to live on the territory.

BRANT, N.Y. (AP) - The Seneca Nation, a tribe in western New York known for its defiant stances on sovereignty, said Friday that it would evict around 80 families living in a lakeshore community on its territory because the residents aren't citizens of the tribe.

The action covers an area on the shores of Lake Erie called Snyder Beach, now dotted with summer cottages, many of which are occupied by people who have been there for decades. Tribal leaders said in a written statement that they want the families out by Nov. 8.

"This is a long-standing issue of unlawful occupation and is key for the Seneca Nation. The Cattaraugus Territory is for Senecas and removing the unlawful occupants will make more land available for Senecas," Seneca President Robert Odawi Porter said in the statement. "It is quite clearly an illegal occupation, even if that may surprise some of the current residents and the general public."

The statement said tribal authorities had issued permits in the past for the last, but hadn't done so in many decades.

The eviction threat outraged Snyder Beach longtime residents, who acknowledged that they lived within the Seneca's Cattaraugus Territory, but said they leased the property annually from a Seneca businessman.

"I built this house. My family has been here 55 years," retired Buffalo firefighter William McNamara, 81, told the Buffalo News. "We built this ourselves. For a lot of us who live here, it's been a lot of hard work, blood and memories. My neighbor is 92 years old, and he says, 'I'll be damned if I'm going to turn my property over to the Indians."

The businessman renting the land to the families, John Metzger, told the newspaper he believed the tribe had no right to throw out his tenants.

"It verges on a cleansing operation, in my opinion," he said. He said Seneca Nation leaders had threatened a similar action six times before, but had never before gone as far as to serve eviction notices.

Seneca officials said Metzger isn't allowed to give leases to people who are not Senecas. Only the Tribal Council has the power to grant permission to the families to live on the territory, they said.

People on both sides said the dispute is certain to wind up in

JESSE ABERNATHY Native Sun News

CHARLESTON, S.C. - A mostly non-Native organization is vociferously calling for a major overhaul of the Indian Child Welfare Act.

Calling itself the "Coalition for the Protection of Indian Children & Families," the organization evolved two months ago out of Charleston in the wake of the "Save Veronica" campaign. The campaign is a grassroots effort to bring national and political attention to the plight of a 2-yearold girl who is of Cherokee heritage and her non-Native American adoptive parents - who ultimately lost custody of the girl

Dec. 31, 2011, after the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma intervened under authority of ICWA on the biological father's behalf.

"Save Veronica" has even garnered international attention via an online petition on Change.org.

Veronica had been with her adoptive parents, Matt and Melanie Capobianco of James Island, S.C., a suburb of Charleston, for more than two years when authorities placed her with her birth father, Dusten Brown, a member of the Cherokee Nation. The couple say, however, the toddler is more Hispanic and Caucasian than any other ethnicity, having only a "small percentage" of Cherokee ancestry.

Brown, who resides in Nowata, Okla.,

originally sued for custody of his daughter Veronica under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act when she was four months old, although initially he had signed a waiver saying he would not contest the adoption. Brown reportedly had "changed his mind" and later claimed he didn't know what he signed.

According to the Capobiancos, who are taking legal measures to regain custody, the child's non-Native American birth mother, who is from Oklahoma, personally selected them through an adoption attorney to raise her daughter.

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. - The Cherokee Nation Election Commission presented its recommendations for election law changes to the Cherokee Tribal Council's Rules Committee July

Made in accordance with the tribe's election laws and observations of the Atlanta-based Carter Center of the 2011 principal chief's race, the commission's recommendations come in an attempt to improve and streamline processes.

Citing voter privacy concerns, among the recommendations made by the Election Commission is a ban of all cameras within 300 feet of polling

"So you are effectively shutting out the media with the change in precincts?" asked Tribal Councilor Cara Cowan Watts.

"That's right," Cherokee Nation Election Commission Vice Chair Lindsay Earls said.

On the first election day in the 2011 race, some reporters from the tribe's newspaper, the Cherokee Phoenix, were allowed in and around precincts while others were escorted out, despite an agreement between then-CNEC chairman Roger Johnson and assistant attorney general Sara Hill allowing reporters in precincts.

In the Carter Center's final report, the observers encouraged the tribe to amend its election law to include parameters for the media, but noted that reporters "play an indispensible role during democratic elections by educating voters and political parties."

New federal charges filed against Native Mob members

MINNEAPOLIS Updated federal charges against alleged members of a Native American-based gang now include murder and aiding attempted murder.

The superseding indictment charges Shaun Martinez with killing another Native Mob member in February 2011. Prosecutors say Martinez killed Jeremee Kraskey to keep him from giving information to law enforcement.

The original indictment filed in January accused 24 suspected Native Mob members with conspiracy to participate in racketeering, alleging they used violence and intimidation to keep the gang in power.

The Bemidji Pioneer says the latest federal charges also accuse two other defendants with aiding and abetting attempted murder in March 2010. They're accused of shooting a man while he held his 5-year-old daughter.

Authorities say the gang wields power from the Twin Cities to reservations throughout Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Tribes want federal regulation of Internet gaming

■ Some tribes worry if regulation is left to states, it will be a patchwork of rules that aren't considerate of the relationship Native Americans have with the federal

SUZANNE GAMBOA Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) -With some states readying to start online gambling, Native American tribal leaders are calling on the federal government to step in as it did with brick-and-mortar gambling and establish regulations that ensure tribes get a piece of the action without having their revenue taxed and their sovereignty compromised.

A new set of regulations is unlikely before this year's election, but recent events have given momentum to efforts to launch online gambling in some states. Since a December 2011 Department of Justice opinion that not all Internet gambling is banned by federal law, Delaware has legalized online gambling and Nevada is closing in on making online poker possible. New Jersey, too, is working to make it a reality.

Some tribes worry if regulation is left to states, it will be a patchwork of rules that aren't considerate of the relationship Native Americans have with the federal government.

"Tribes should extremely hesitant to entrust their economic futures to the tender mercies of the 50 states, many of whom are still in financial crises and looking for new sources of revenue," Bruce "Two Dogs" Bozsum said Thursday in testimony before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. Bozsum is chairman of the Mohegan Tribe of Uncasville, Conn., which has large casino operations.

Bozsum said his tribe has invested a "great deal of time" preparing Internet gambling regulations. "These regulations now stand ready to be implemented, and will meet or exceed the toughest regulations found anywhere in the world, including the new standards recently established in Nevada," Bozsum said.

According to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, tribal gambling was a more than $27 billion industry in 2011, while commercial gambling was $35.6 billion and worldwide gambling revenues were $30 billion.

Glen Gobin, secretary of the Tulalip Tribal Council, reminded the committee that he previously testified against legalizing Internet gambling. But on Thursday, Gobin said that with states ready to start their own Internet gambling, "tribes must have equal footing to participate."

Gobin said his tribe, in Tulalip, Wash., plans to move forward as gambling evolves because the revenue pays for many of the tribe's government services. The Tulalip do not have regulations ready because tribes' participation has not been decided.

"To say we are ready for the full regulatory aspect, we are not, but I have full confidence we have the capabilities," Gobin said.

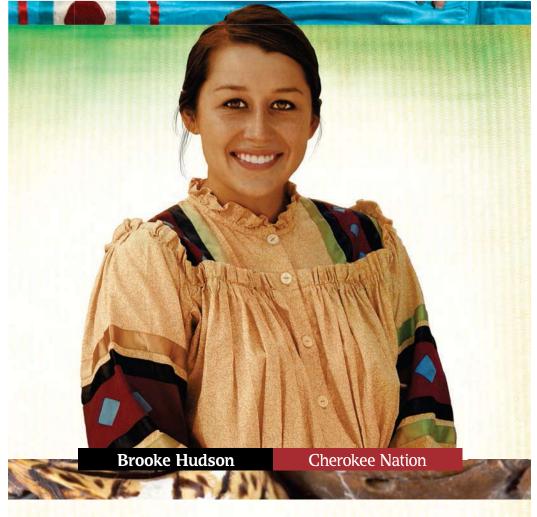

Jon Porter, a lobbyist for the Poker Players Alliance, urged tribes to get prepared because online gambling "has to happen."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., have been working on online gambling legislation. Kyl is a previous opponent of online gambling. On Wednesday, the Senate Indian Affairs Committee spelled out how the federal government could regulate online gambling so tribes are protected and included at a meeting of tribal leaders for the National Indian Gaming Association's Legislative Summit on Wednesday.

"We in Congress - and especially on this committee - also have a responsibility to ensure that tribal views and priorities are part of any legislation that could impact tribal gaming," said committee chairman Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii.

Also Thursday, the Senate voted to move forward on cybersecurity legislation, intended to protect U.S. computer systems and infrastructure from cyberattacks. But if the bill moves forward and ultimately passes the Senate, it still would need to be reconciled with a House version. Little other legislation has moved through Congress, making it more likely that any movement on Internet legislation would happen after elections in the lame-duck session.

Cloud Peak Energy, Crow Tribe reach 1.4B-ton coal deal

■ Tribal leaders hoped that plant would give an economic boost to the Crow's 13,000 enrolled citizens.

MATTHEW BROWN Associated Press

BILLINGS, Mont. (AP) - A Wyoming mining company has reached tentative option agreements to lease and mine an estimated 1.4 billion tons of coal on southeastern Montana's Crow Indian Reservation, in a deal that appears aimed at tapping into the growing export market for a fuel that's in decline domestically.

The amount of fuel involved in the deal is more than the U.S. consumes annually.

Cloud Peak Energy said

it would pay the tribe up to $10 million during an initial option period if the deal is approved by the Crow Tribal Legislature and federal officials with the Department of Interior.

The deal covers three coal deposits near Cloud Peak's existing Spring Creek mine near the Wyoming border. The tribe's reserves are within the Powder River Basin coal fields, which account for about 40 percent of the nation's coal production.

Crow Chairman Cedric Black Eagle has said in past interviews that the coal could be exported to Asian markets, although it's uncertain when mining could begin.

"Partnering with the Cloud Peak Energy will help diversify the tribe's long-term coal revenue, provide good jobs and potential access to export markets for tribal coal," Black Eagle said in a statement.

The announcement follows a stalled partnership between the Crow and an Australian company that hoped to build a $7 billion coal-toliquids plant on the rural and impoverished reservation.

Tribal leaders hoped that plant would give an economic boost to the Crow's 13,000 enrolled citizens. But four years after the Many Stars coal-to-liquids project was announced, its prospects remain uncertain due to financing difficulties and other problems.

Negotiations with Cloud Peak to lease and mine reserves on the eastern side of the 2.2 million-acre reservation have been going on since at least last fall. The agreements provide for exploration and options for Cloud Peak to lease the three deposits for an initial five-year term.

That lease could be extended to 2035 if certain conditions are met, the tribe and Cloud peak said. If the company exercises the lease options, it would pay the tribe up to 15 cents per ton, royalties and production taxes.

The company also would offer preferential hiring to American Indians and $50,000annually in scholarships for Crow members.

Cloud Peak already has three surface mines in the Powder River Basin - the Antelope and Cordero Rojo mines in Wyoming and Spring Creek, near Decker, Mont. The company recently acquired the Youngs Creek coal deposit in Wyoming and nearby lands in Montana known as the CX Ranch.

Cloud Peak President Colin Marshall said in a statement that the location of the Crow coal next to Spring Creek, Youngs Creek and the CX Ranch would allow the company to "optimize" mine development. It was unclear if Cloud Peak intends to develop those other properties and company officials did not return immediate calls for comment.

Black Eagle said coal would be shipped through existing train loading facilities at Spring Creek.

Since the 1970s the tribe has leased coal on the northern end of the reservation to Westmoreland Resources. The company's Absaloka Mine produced 5.5 million tons of fuel in 2011.

VA announces new grants to help end veteran homelessness

■ Initiative targets 42,000 homeless and at-risk vets and families

NITA MCCLELLAN VA Public Affairs Officer

WASHINGTON - Secretary of Veterans Affairs Eric K. Shinseki announced July 18 the awarding of nearly $100 million in grants that will help approximately 42,000 homeless and at-risk Veterans and their families. The grants are going to 151 community agencies in 49 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico.

Eastern Oklahoma, the Community Services Council of Greater Tulsa, Inc. will receive a renewal grant of $996,025, which will help the organization continue to serve approximately 500 participant households in the counties of Washington, Tulsa, Muskogee, Creek, Cherokee, Rogers, Okmulgee, Osage and Wagoner.

"We are committed to ending Veteran homelessness in America, said Shinseki. "These grants will help VA and community organizations reach out and prevent at-risk Veterans from losing their homes."

Under the Supportive Services for Veteran Families program, VA is awarding grants to private, nonprofit organizations and consumer cooperatives that provide services to very low-income Veteran families living in -- or transitioning to -- permanent housing. Those community organizations provide a range of services that promote housing stability among eligible, very low income Veteran families.

Under the grants, homeless providers will offer Veterans and their family members outreach, case management, assistance in obtaining VA benefits and assistance in getting other public benefits. Communitybased groups can offer temporary financial assistance on behalf of Veterans for rent payments, utility payments, security deposits and moving costs.

This is the program's second year. Last year, VA provided about $60 million to assist 22,000 Veterans and family members.

In 2009, President Obama and Secretary Shinseki announced the federal government's goal to end Veteran homelessness by 2015. The grants are intended to help accomplish that goal. According to the 2011 Annual Homelessness Assessment Report to Congress, homelessness among Veterans has declined 12 percent since January 2010.

Through the homeless Veterans initiative, VA committed $800 million in FY 2011 to strengthen programs that prevent and end homelessness among Veterans. VA provides a range of services to homeless Veterans, including health care, housing, job training, and education.

More information about VA's homeless programs is available on the Internet at www.va.gov/homeless. Details about the Supportive Services for Veteran Families program are online at www.va.gov/homeless/ssvf.

Nez Perce tribe divvies up settlement money

■ Other recipients of large sums included the Idaho tribe at nearly $34 million, New Mexico's Mescalero Apache Nation at nearly $33 million and Montana's Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes at $150 million.

LEWISTON, Idaho (AP) Members of the Nez Perce Tribe will each receive about $8,600 as part of a settlement with the federal government over mismanagement of tribal money and trust lands.

The federal government announced earlier this year that it would pay $1 billion to resolve lawsuits brought by 41 American Indian tribes attempting to reclaim money lost in mismanaged accounts and from royalties for oil, gas, grazing and timber rights on tribal lands.

northern Idaho, 3,500-member Nez Perce Tribe received $33.7 million on July 10 as part of the settlement, the Lewiston Tribune reported.

The tribe has previously estimated that each citizen would receive into U.S. District Court record. approximately $9,500 under the notice was posted on the tribe's members that $3 million would go to the Native American Rights Fund.

Colorado-based group represented the Nez Perce Tribe in the lawsuit.

Of the remaining $30.7 million, tribal members will each receive approximately $8,600, according to the letter posted on the tribe's website earlier this month.

Those members who met an initial July 18 deadline to apply for their portion of the settlement funds should receive checks by Tuesday. As for tribal citizens who are still minors, their money will be held in a trust until they turn 18, the letter said.

To be eligible for the funds, citizens must have been enrolled in the tribe as of May 4. For tribal citizens who were alive as of May 4 but have since passed away, their estates may seek the funds on their behalf, the notice said. Those who applied for tribe enrollment before July 10 also will be deemed eligible if their application was subsequently approved.

The settlement was announced jointly in April by the Justice Department and the Interior Department, which manages more than 100,000 leases on tribal trust lands and about 2,500 tribal trust accounts for more than 250 federally recognized tribes.

The government didn't release the dollar amounts that each of the 41 tribes would receive as part of the settlement, though some were entered

Among those, recipients of large agreement. But that was before a sums included the Idaho tribe at nearly $34 million, New Mexico's Mescalero website earlier this month telling Apache Nation at nearly $33 million and Montana's Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes at $150 million. The Ute Mountain Ute Tribe in southwest Colorado, southeast Utah and northern New Mexico, was to receive nearly $42.6 million.

Expert: Hurdles to protecting reservation children

■ You could have two houses sitting together, one tribal and one non-tribal, and they're under different jurisdictions.

CHUCK HAGA
Grand Forks Herald

GRAND FORKS, N.D. (AP) – As a member of the University of North Dakota's Indian Studies faculty, Greg Gagnon used to give students a "pretest" to see what they knew about American Indians. He also sent them into the field to quiz other students.

Nearly all the students were not Indian, and what they "knew" was that Indians get a check every month just for being Indian, they attend college for free, they are violent drunks and are wealthy because of welfare and casinos.

"The stereotypes have not changed over the years since 1998, when I started doing the assignment," said Gagnon, 69, who retired at UND in December.

Ignorance about Indians and how reservations work are among hurdles facing the Spirit Lake Nation as it tries to fix problems in its child protection system, Gagnon said, problems that have drawn heavy scrutiny in recent months.

"The reality is there – abuse is a problem, a major problem," he said. "It's a problem at almost every reservation in the country. There are cracks – gigantic gaps – for people to fall through. Tribal government is too often crisis government, and that's true of social workers as well as elected officials.

"It isn't a personal choice of neglect by the social workers or tribal officials," he said. "Yes, you have people drop the ball. There are personal failures. But the system has been set up by federal Indian policy and law, by state activity and inactivity, and these crossing jurisdictions are what the tribe has to figure out. You get into all kinds of major legal problems when you intervene where you don't have jurisdiction."

Gagnon is an enrolled citizen of the Red River Band of the Lake Superior Chippewa in northern Wisconsin. Before coming to UND, he lived for 17 years on the Pine Ridge Sioux reservation in South Dakota, where he was academic vice president at the tribal college.

While he makes no claims to be an expert on Spirit Lake, he speaks frequently on tribal law and governance. His book, "Culture and Customs of the Sioux Indians," was published in 2011.

The unsolved murders of two young siblings last year and circumstances in the death of a 2-month-old baby earlier this month have been cited by critics on and off the reservation as examples of an ongoing crisis of children at risk there. Federal, state and tribal authorities promised investigations, and some have cited muddled jurisdiction as a contributing factor.

The Tribal Law and Order Act was signed into law last July, as Congress noted that fewer than 3,000 tribal and federal law officers patrol more than 56 million acres, less than half the average law presence in comparable rural areas nationwide. Congress also stated that "the complicated jurisdictional scheme that exists in Indian country has a significant negative impact on the ability to provide public safety to Indian communities."

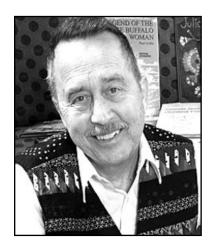

Indian organizations welcomed the legislation, which "offers a great opportunity to improve the justice systems in Indian country," according to the Tribal Law and Order Resource Center, a division of the National Congress of American Indians. "But, implementation will require significant coordination" by federal, state, county and tribal authorities, and that is likely to take time.

The U.S. attorneys for North Dakota and South Dakota, hosting a workshop last week in Fargo, promised to seek better coordination in the prosecution of crimes against women and children on the two states' reservations.

"If I were waving a magic wand, I would do more to implement the new federal crime act, which offers the opportunity for cross-deputizing," Gagnon said. "With tribal police deputized by the state, a tribal police officer would be able to deal better with those jurisdictional issues."

More than half of the Spirit Lake reservation is non-Indian owned, he said. A good portion of the population is non-Indian and therefore not under tribal jurisdiction.

"Tribal police can't intervene even within the boundaries of the reservation on private, deeded land," Gagnon said. "There are lots of those places on every reservation in North Dakota and most of the rest of the country. And the county can't intervene on trust land," because it is Indian-controlled.

"You could have two houses sitting together, one tribal and one non-tribal, and they're under different jurisdictions," he said. "Given the laws and restrictions that each jurisdiction has, (officers) sometimes can't legally intervene. There are very few people who have so much courage they just go ahead and do it anyway, and those people don't last long."

The sovereignty proclaimed by Indian nations and recognized in treaties is a factor in the jurisdictional maze, and Gagnon said it is another part of Indian life poorly understood by others.

"One of the principles held by most people in the world, including indigenous people, is that a nation should have control of its own destiny and should be able to regulate and govern itself," he said. "What tribes are trying to do is retain what they've been able to keep of their sovereignty, and to regain what they can of what they've lost."

That includes Indian children. The state took children away, sending them to non-Indian foster homes and boarding schools through what's been called the "assimilation" period, or what some Indians call the "cultural genocide" period, Gagnon said.

"The 1978 Indian Child Welfare Act recognized tribal primacy over the disposition of Indian children," he said. "When social workers wanted to take Indian children and put them somewhere, they had to make an effort to find which tribe the child belonged to and notify that tribe. The tribe has a right to determine what happens to the child in adoption as well as in child abuse cases."

The 1978 law allows a state judge to intervene with an emergency declaration and direct the placement of an Indian child regardless of what the tribe says. "Sometimes you just have to intervene for the benefit of the child," Gagnon said.

"Social workers in Grand Forks may see only the child in front of them, but there is this larger issue of taking people away from a nation," he said. "The nation has an interest in maintaining a society."

Another factor complicating child protection and other social services is the funding stream, actually many streams, with some diverted through the state.

"The state has its obligation (of oversight), just as it does to maintain public schools on the reservation," Gagnon said.

"There are some reservations where you have (Bureau of Indian Affairs) social workers, tribal social workers and state social workers, all trying to provide services, operating under three different masters (and) sometimes working at cross purposes," he said.

Rapid turnover is another problem.

Gagnon said a friend used to boast that she held the record for longevity as a case worker at the Pine Ridge reservation. "She held the position for a year," he said.

"Overall in Indian country, there aren't enough social workers who are trained – and also trained to be culturally proficient. That is, they may not understand how the reservation works and the culture," he said. "You need to know those things if you're going to be an effective agent for the community."

It's not all bleak in Indian country, however, Gagnon said.

"Generally speaking, there has been a steady improvement in the effectiveness of government on the reservations," he said. "But major legacies continue to haunt us, such as the number of unemployed. With that go the kinds of problems we've seen recently in homes at Spirit Lake."

Gagnon notes that those problems – including the neglect, abuse and sexual abuse of children – can be found in other areas where poverty, unemployment and despair are chronic.

"We could go to Chicago and Dallas and New Orleans and south Texas and find the same thing," he said. "It's all there, and it's poverty-related and compounded by alcoholism and drugs. Unemployment creates a dangerous social situation for children anywhere."

ELECTION

■ The Carter Center encouraged amending the election law and noted that reporters "play an indispensible role during democratic elections by educating voters and political parties."

In addition to the proposed restrictions on reporters, the Election Commission recommended automatically registering citizens to vote when they initially enroll.

"I think that's a very good idea because so many people went to the polls just with their blue card (tribal citizenship card)," Tribal Councilor Janelle Fullbright said. "By the time they found out they weren't actually registered to vote, it was too late."

Earls said Thursday that the commission will allow for public input when it comes time to consider adding the recommendations to their bylaws.

Earls and commission chairman Bill Horton were also questioned by Tribal Councilor Dick Lay about the possibility of the tribe running its own elections instead of bringing in a third-party contractor. Automated Election Services from Rio Rancho, N.M., provided ballots and voting machines for the tribe's 2011 election.

"We met with the Cherokee County (Okla.) Election Board months ago, who has done it in the past," Earls said. "We might be able to do it in the future, but there simply isn't enough time to do it before the next election."

The Cherokee Nation's next election is 2013, when half of the Tribal Council seats will be on the ballot. The tribe's legislative branch is in the process of transitioning from five districts with three representatives each to 15 single-representative districts.

Earls and Horton did not provide a timeline at Thursday's meeting for when their recommendations would be implemented other than it would be after the conclusion of the council's redistricting efforts.

ICWA

complexity of the Indian Child Welfare Act – is currently under review by the South Carolina Supreme Court.

In a July 4 press release, the Coalition for the Protection of Indian Children & Families, which is seeking fundamental amendments to ICWA, said it "represents a collective group of individuals and organizations dedicated to the constitutional rights of Indian children and their families as American citizens in order to ensure their lives are free from unnecessary pain and suffering."

Specifically, the group wants to limit the time for a biological parent to revoke consent for an adoption. The group also says Native American birth parents should be able to choose where their children are placed – even if parental choices go against a tribe's wishes.

Instead of the full year currently allowed under the act for natural parents to revoke their adoption consent, the Coalition for the Protection of Indian Children & Families says 30 days is sufficient.

Paradoxically, the coalition is looking to make it easier for non-Native families – such as the Capobiancos – to adopt Native children by way of the Indian Child Welfare Act.

"This defeats the entire purpose" of the federal legislation, Chrissi Ross Nimmo, assistant attorney general for the Cherokee Nation, told the Tulsa World in Oklahoma in a recent interview.

Enacted by Congress in 1978 following over a century of oftentimes unnecessary removal of Native American children from their traditional tribal homes and communities by federal, state and even local authorities, the Indian Child Welfare Act gives tribal governments a strong voice concerning the custody proceedings of Native children. The law grants tribes exclusive jurisdiction over custody cases involving children residing on-reservation and children who are wards of the tribe, as well as concurrent – but presumptive – jurisdiction with states over off-reservation children's foster care placement proceedings, as in the case of the Capobianco family.

In delayed recognition of the unique relationship that exists between the federal government and the country's original inhabitants as sovereign nations whose lands were unceremoniously usurped in relentless pursuit of "Manifest Destiny," ICWA was a conscious, as well as conspicuous, attempt by the federal government to preserve and protect Native families and – ultimately –cultures, many of which are historically based in an extended family system.

Prior to the enactment of ICWA, as many as 25 to 35 percent of all Native children were being removed from their homes and placed in non-Native homes, according to various research reports from the late 1970s. In some cases, the Bureau of Indian Affairs paid states to remove Native children and place them with non-Native families and religious groups.

Under the law, tribes and Native parents or other custodians of Native children have an unqualified right to intervene in cases involving foster care placement or the termination of parental rights.

Additionally, active efforts to place Native children removed from their homes with extended tribal relatives, other nonrelated tribal members or even other nonrelated Natives must be made under the law. The provision was designed to serve as a safeguard against a child's loss of true familial and cultural connections.

"The public rarely hears about the thousands of cases a year that either reunite Indian children with their biological parents or the cases where Indian children find permanent, loving adoptive homes with members of their family," said Nimmo.

"The problems you hear about in high-profile cases are not caused by the law itself. The problems are caused when attorneys, adoption agencies and courts do not follow the federal law," she said.

A recent case in South Dakota might exemplify Nimmo's contention: In ruling in custody proceedings involving the child of a Native American mother who formerly resided in South Dakota and Native American father residing in California, the state's Supreme Court last month said – for the first time since the Indian Child Welfare Act was created in 1978 – that the federal law's requirement of an active effort to keep an American Indian family together imposes a higher standard than the reasonable effort required in state law for non-Indian families, as reported by The Associated Press

In what could be seen as an anti-ICWA move, the precedent-setting decision more narrowly defined the extent of efforts that the state must make to prevent the breakup of an American Indian family.

Some Native American families have argued that South Dakota does not do enough to comply with federal laws dealing with removing Indian children from their families, the AP reported, but the Supreme Court said state officials complied with those laws in this instance.

In one of its first official moves, the Coalition for the Protection of Indian Children & Families held a meeting in Washington, D.C., July 11 in an effort to draw congressional attention to its

According to the organization's July 4 press release, its members – comprised of individual non-Native Americans and Native Americans, businesses, nonprofits, religious groups and advocacy organizations – are lobbying for "what they feel are reasonable amendments that will help strengthen how the (Indian Child Welfare Act) is being used. Federal and state tax dollars fund the implementation of the law – a law that the Coalition feels denies Indian children the same rights as other children."

Of the group's four founding members, one is Native American.

Though no tribes are members of the coalition, they are welcome to join, said Jessica Munday, a non-Native co-founder of and spokeswoman for the organization, and a few individuals have joined from South Dakota.

"The (proposed) amendments would help strengthen the law in a lot of ways and will help ensure that these negative cases (such as the Capobiancos') don't happen as often," Munday told Native Sun News July 20. "But we haven't reached that point, and we certainly put the invitation out there to begin that dialogue."

Native American critics of the organization, however, say it is looking to dismantle ICWA and call its actions a threat to the protection of Native children and preservation of their respective cultures.

Munday says the coalition is merely speaking on behalf of those individuals who have been negatively impacted by the Indian Child Welfare Act since its inception over three decades ago, including Native American birth and foster parents. "Hundreds, if not thousands, of people have reached out to us for help," she noted.

"I've heard of many cases where a (Native) child has an opportunity to have a permanent, loving, healthy home, but because that home is non-Native they're taken from that home and put into the foster care system," she said. "And I just don't see how that's in the best interest of a child when they have a chance to have a permanent home."

Representatives from the Cherokee Nation as well as congressional aides were in attendance at the Washington meeting, according to Munday, and a "good dialogue" was started.

Munday added that the group is seeking a compromise with Congress regarding ICWA that doesn't disrespect Native heritage, repeal the law, or spell the end of Native cultures.

However, ICWA as it stands "gives special treatment" to Native American children, she says, and "I've always been of the mindset that ... to be fair it should be the same for everyone. ... To me, it doesn't seem fair to do that for one population and not all the other children as well."

Chief Joseph war shirt fetches $877,500 at auction

MARTIN GRIFFITH Associated Press

RENO, Nevada (AP) – A war shirt worn by Chief Joseph of the Nez Perce tribe that can be seen in a painting hanging in the Smithsonian Institution sold Saturday for $877,500 at auction, organizers said.

Mike Overby, an organizer of the annual Coeur d'Alene Art Auction, said the shirt that sold in Reno is considered to be one of the most important Native American artifacts to ever come to auction. It had been expected to bring from $800,000 to $1.2 million at auction, he said.

"Anything associated with Chief Joseph is highly desirable, and that's a pretty special shirt," he told The Associated Press.

Chief Joseph wore the shirt in 1877 in the earliest known photo of him, and again while posing for a portrait by Cyrenius Hall in 1878. That painting, which was used for a U.S. postage stamp, hangs in the Smithsonian.

The poncho-style war shirt was made of two soft skins, likely deerskin. It features beadwork with bold geometric designs and bright colors. Warriors kept such prestigious garments clean in a saddlebag on their horse or carefully stored while in camp, to be worn only on special occasions, American Indian scholar Theodore Brasser noted.

The shirt surfaced at an Indian relic show in the 1990s and was sold without any knowledge of its link to the photo and portrait. It changed hands again before the connection was discovered.

Its quality makes it desirable for collectors, but it's the "surprising discovery of the shirt's role in history that reveals its true importance," said Brasser, a former curator of the National Museum of Ethnology in Leiden, Netherlands, and at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Ottawa

The photo and portrait showing the war shirt were made shortly after Chief Joseph led 750 Nez Perce tribal members on an epic 1,700-mile journey from Oregon to Montana in an unsuccessful bid to reach Canada and avoid being confined to a reservation. They were forced to surrender in 1877 after U.S. troops stopped them about 40 miles (64 kilometers)south of the Canadian border.

In a famous speech made after the surrender, Chief Joseph said: "From where the sun now stands, I will fight no more forever."

The shirt's sale involved private collectors. "It was a wild-card piece. We're real happy where it ended up," Overby

Despite its price, it was not the topselling piece at the auction. The painting "Scout's Report," by Howard Terpning, went for $994,500, followed by $965,250 for "Cowboys Roping the Bear" by Frank Tenny Johnson.

Some 400 bidders took part in what's billed as the world's largest Western art sale. About 300 works were sold for a total of $17.2 million, up from $16.9 million last year and $9.2 million the year before.

parent under federal law. Because it is an adoption case, the order did not mention specific names for privacy reasons.

The court used as its guide the federal Indian Child Welfare Act, passed in 1978 because of the high number of Indian children that at the time were being removed from their homes by public and private agencies. The act gives the child's tribe and family the right to have a say in decisions affecting the child.

In this case, now-2-yearold Veronica was adopted by Matt and Melanie Capobianco, who live on James Island just outside Charleston. They attended the girl's birth and cared for her thereafter.

The girl's father, Dusten Brown, a member of the Cherokee Nation, later went to court seeking custody. A South Carolina court awarded Brown custody of the child, and he arrived in Charleston on New Year's Eve with his parents to take the girl back to Oklahoma.

The adoptive parents appealed, and the Supreme Court heard the case during a closed hearing in April. During the girl's time with the Capobiancos, the court wrote, the family has likely formed a significant bond. But that isn't enough to keep her from her biological father, given the constraints of the federal law.

"While we are conscious that any separation will cause some degree of pain, we can only conclude from the evidence presented at trial that Father desires to be a parent to Baby Girl, and that he and his family have created a safe, loving and appropriate home for her," the court wrote.

The justices also wrote that while determining what is in the child's best interest is of high importance in a custody case, the girl's Native American heritage also plays a key role.

"Where an Indian child's best interests are at stake, our inquiry into that child's best interests must also account for his or her status as an Indian," the court wrote. "Baby Girl, as an Indian child, has a strong interest in retaining ties to her cultural heritage."

Justice John Kittredge, in his dissent, said he would have approved the adoption by the South Carolina couple.

"Today the Court decides the fate of a child without regard to her best interests and welfare," he wrote. "Father purposely abandoned this child and no amount of revisionist history can change that truth."

A message left with Brown's attorney was not immediately returned Thursday. In a statement, the attorney general for the Cherokee Nation heralded the decision as a victory for Native American families. The Capobiancos said they were saddened by the ruling.

"We love our little girl deeply and only want what is best for her," they said. "This decision will prevent us from having any involvement in her life. Our hearts are completely broken."

Family spokeswoman Jessica Munday said the couple could appeal the case to the U.S. Supreme Court but hadn't decided what to do next.

"The law is meant to preserve and protect children. It was not meant to devastate individuals, Native American or non-Native American," she said. "And the reality is that's what's happening."

Terry Cross, the executive director of the National Indian Child Welfare Association based in Portland, Ore., said the ruling was consistent with others across the country.

"The National Indian Child Welfare Association commends the court's affirmation of the rights of Veronica's biological father," Cross said.

Bruce Smith contributed to this report from Charleston.

Celebration planned for white bison birth at Connecticut farm

MICHAEL MELIA Associated Press

GOSHEN, Conn. (AP) – The birth of a white bison, one of the rarest of animals, is bringing Native Americans who consider it a sacred event to celebrate at one of the least likely of places, a farm in New England.

Hundreds of people, including tribal elders from South Dakota, are expected to attend naming ceremonies later this month at the northwestern Connecticut farm of Peter Fay, a fourth-generation Goshen farmer.

Native Americans in the area have come with gifts of tobacco and colored flags for Fay and the bull calf since it was born there a month ago, and Fay is planning to offer his hay field as a campsite for the expected crowds.

"They say it's going to bring good things to all people in the world. How can you beat that? That's the way I look at it," Fay said.

Connecticut farms host only about 100 bison, a tiny fraction of the populations in Western states, such as South Dakota, the home of Sioux tribes that attach the greatest spiritual meaning to white bison. As some push for greater recognition of the bison's significance to both the United States and Native Americans, advocates say the event on the far-flung East Coast is well-placed to boost exposure for the cause.

Fay, whose family traditionally stuck to dairy farming, took on bison four years ago as a hobby, enamored by the animals' toughness. He built his herd to 40 before recently selling half of them.

Word spread rapidly after the arrival of the white bison, which experts say is as rare as one in 10 million, and Fay invited Native Americans for the ceremonies at his farm below Mohawk Mountain. In turn, he and his two daughters were asked to participate in the celebrations, which will include a feast and talks by the elders.

"They're here almost every day, teaching me," said the 53-year-old Fay, who has bison tattoos on his shoulder and chest.

Marian White Mouse, a member of the Oglala Lakota tribe in South Dakota, said the birth of a white bison is a sign from a prophet, the White Buffalo Calf Woman, who helped them endure times of strife and famine. White Mouse's family of four is flying to Connecticut for the ceremonies.

"For me, it's like a surreal event. I never thought in my wildest dreams I would ever come in contact with one of them in my lifetime," said White Mouse, 51, of Wanblee, S.D.

Jim Stone, the executive director of the InterTribal Buffalo Council in Rapid City, S.D., said the oral traditions of many tribes honor white bison, which have become a universal symbol for hope and unity. He said each such birth is also an opportunity for tribes to share their history, and the celebration in Connecticut is likely to touch many non-tribal people.

The calf, born on June 16, is off-white – not an albino – and Fay said he is certain the bloodlines are pure, although he has sent its DNA for testing to confirm there was no intermingling with cattle. Fay, who also works at an excavating and rock-crushing business, focuses on breeding and selling the bison calves, but he has not determined what will happen with the white one.

To address concerns for the calf's safety, he also has at least one person stay at the farm around the clock. Last year, a white bison calf born in Texas was found dead and skinned – a slaughter that some suspect as an anti-Indian hate crime. Fay did not want the date of the ceremonies this month publicized.

Tens of millions of bison once roamed America's plains, but the over-hunted population shrank to about 1,000 toward the end of the 1800s. Their numbers have rebounded to several hundred thousand, and wildlife and tribal groups are now pushing Congress to have the bison recognized as America's "national mammal." The National Bison Legacy Act was introduced in the Senate in May.

"Any kind of awareness we can raise around bison is a good thing," said Jim Matheson, assistant director of the National Bison Association in Denver.

Rare white buffalo calf dies at ranch

AVON, Minn. (AP) – A rare white buffalo calf has died at a central Minnesota ranch.

The calf named Baby died last Friday at Countryside Buffalo Ranch in Avon. The white heifer was born July

4 on the ranch run by Steve and

Carol Sarff tells the St. Cloud Times she noticed on July 18 that the calf seemed to have injured its hip. She and her husband put the calf in a barn where it was cooler and contacted the veterinarian.

Steve Sarff says heat causes flies to swarm around buffalo, and he suspects the calf may have been inadvertently kicked by its mother.

New Tonto, familiar feelings for Native Americans

MANUEL VALDES Associated Press

SEATTLE (AP) - Gyasi Ross grew up decades after the "Lone Ranger" aired on TV, but his friends would still call him "Tonto" when they teased him.

The making of a new "Lone Ranger" Disney movie, and the announcement that Johnny Depp is playing sidekick Tonto, have reawakened feelings about a character that has drawn much criticism over the years as being a Hollywood creation guilty of spreading stereotypes.

"Everybody understands who Tonto is, even if we hadn't seen the show, and we understood it wasn't a good thing," said Ross, a citizen of the Blackfeet Nation in Montana who lives and has family in the Suquamish Tribe, outside Seattle. "Why else would you tease someone with that?"

The film is still in production, but Native American groups have been abuzz about it for months, with many sharing opinions online and in a national Native publication running an occasional series on the topic.

Some Native Americans welcome the new movie, slated for release next summer. Parts were filmed on the Navajo Nation with the tribe's support, and an Oklahoma tribe recently made Depp an honorary citizen.

But for others, the "Lone Ranger" represents a lingering sore spot - one that goes back to the 1950s television version of Tonto, who spoke in broken English, wore buckskin and lacked any real cultural traits.

Depp's role attracted particular attention in April when producer Jerry Bruckheimer tweeted a picture of the actor in his Tonto costume. He had on black and white face paint, an intense gaze, a black bird attached to his head and plenty of decorative feathers.

"The moment it hit my Facebook newsfeed, the updates from my friends went nutso," wrote Natanya Ann Pulley, a doctorate student at University of Utah, in an essay for the online magazine McSweeney's.

For Pulley and her friends, the portrayal of Native Americans in Western movies is getting old.

"I'm worried about the Tonto figure becoming a parody or a commercialized figure that doesn't have any dimension or depth, or consideration for contemporary context of Native Americans," she said.

Native Americans are far from a monolithic group, and many are opening their arms to the new movie. Some are just excited to see Depp take the role.

In New Mexico, where some of the movie was filmed, the Navajo presented Depp, his co-star Armie Hammer, director Gore Verbinski and Bruckheimer with Pendleton blankets to welcome them to their land. Elsewhere, the Comanche people of Oklahoma made Depp, one of Hollywood's most bankable stars, an honorary citizen.

"In my niece's mind, I met Jack Sparrow," said Emerald Dahozy, spokeswoman for Navajo President Ben Shelly and a member of the Navajo group who met with Depp. "My personal view, I like him playing in a character which he can embody Dahozy said the "Lone Ranger" production brought something more palpable to the reservation: money. The actors and the large crew lived on Navajo land, eating at local restaurants and staying in towns that rely heavily on tourism.

Native Americans aren't the only ones conflicted about the character of Tonto, which means "dumb" in Spanish. For Mexican Americans who grew up in the Southwest, the character draws up memories of one of the first dark-skinned heroes in popular culture and anger over a white man calling a brown-skinned person "dumb," said Rosa-Linda Fregoso, author of "Bronze Screen: Chicana and Chicano Film Culture" and a Latino Studies professor at the University of California, Santa Cruz.

"I remember rooting for him as a kid, but even I was a little bit offended as a child," said Fregoso. "For a grown white man to call someone 'Tonto' meant that you were less than human, not fully human or childlike."

In fact, Tonto's character has historically been called "Toro," which means "bull," in Spanish-language versions of early films, and Spanish language stories about Depp's role in the new film refers to his character as

Disney representatives declined to comment, but Depp has said the film will be a "sort of rock 'n' roll version career on the line."

The "Lone Ranger" began on the radio in the 1930s. Tonto was played by an actor of Irish descent, according to the Lone Ranger Fan Club.

The show rocketed in popularity and made a seamless transition to television, running on ABC from 1949 to 1957. In 2003, a TV reboot flopped. That version featured a Native Canadian actor playing Tonto.

character with no individuality and no life beyond helping the Lone Ranger.

Reportedly costing more than $200 million, plus yet-to-be-added marketing costs, Disney's "Lone Ranger" is the type of film that can make or break a studio's summer. It's already been plagued with budget woes. The movie's release date in 2013 was recently pushed back a month.

This film still released by producer Jerry Bruckheimer showing Johnny Depp dressed as Tonto and Armie Hammer as the Lone Ranger prompted a storm of comments on social websites like Facebook and Twitter, with many concerned that Tonto would become a parody or commercialized figure.

But the 1950s portrayal of Tonto by Jay Silverheels, a Canadian Mohawk, is by far the most recognized.

He spoke in pidgin and was the loyal partner of the crime-fighting ranger, often bailing out the masked avenger from treacherous situations.

First Nations grant helps Ponca Tribe feed elders, encourage youth interest in agriculture

AMOS HINTON Ponca Tribe of Oklahoma

PONCA CITY, Okla. - The Ponca Tribe of Oklahoma recently received a $25,000 grant from First Nations Development Institute of Longmont, Colorado. This award will support the efforts of the Ponca Tribe in providing fresh meat to its tribal elders.

The tribe has purchased quality breeding stock from regional producers of show quality pigs. The goal is to raise quality animals and supply the packaged product to tribal elders at no cost. Pigs were chosen because they reproduce more quickly than other livestock. By raising pigs, the tribe can help more people in a relatively short time period.

Show stock was chosen in hopes that youth that are interested in the world of agriculture may have a show animal available. It is hard for a family to be able to purchase a show animal for their children and be able to afford the feed. Thanks to First Nations, The Ponca Tribe will be able to provide the animal at no cost to the child.

"It's a wonderful thing to know that we, as a tribe are able to assist our tribal elders in such a way," said Ben Arkeketa, Ponca tribal administrator.

The Ponca Tribal A gricultureDepartment cares for the pigs. They began with one boar and two sows. The plan is be a 20sow operation by next fall.

The pig operation fits nicely with the other agricultural ventures of the Ponca Tribe in trying to control the quality of food eaten by tribal citizens. The entire department is run with the wholesome approach of no added hormones or chemicals. From native teas, homemade hominy and dried sweet corn, to their pork, it is as natural as possible.

Eagle Adventure diabetes prevention program draws tribal health staff to OSU

■ Free books are available to order for families and programs serving Native American children.

LEE LONGHORN Tribal Liaison Oklahoma State University

STILLWATER, Okla. — Tribal health staff from across the state will meet for a partnership workshop on the Oklahoma State University campus to learn more about the Eagle Adventure program. The three-day workshop will focus on the implementation of the Eagle Adventure program; a type 2 diabetes prevention program developed using the Center for Disease Control's (CDC) Eagle Book series as its central theme.

partnership workshop is being held this week through Aug. 1 in Stillwater and brings more than 20 participants from six Oklahoma tribes.

Participants will interactive sessions hands-on activities to better understand the program and its goals.

Oklahoma tribes represented at the workshop include: Chickasaw Nation, Choctaw Nation, Comanche Nation, Iowa Tribe, Otoe-Missouria Tribe, Pawnee Nation and Sac and Fox Nation. A small team from the Myskoke Food Sovereignty Initiative from the Muscogee (Creek) Nation will also be in attendance and help prepare a traditional meal.

An interdisciplinary team from the OSU College of Human Science's Nutritional Sciences Department and the Chickasaw Nation developed the Eagle Adventure program collaboratively. Funding for the program is through the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program Education grant.

The program strives to improve the health and nutrition of youth who are increasingly at risk of developing type 2 diabetes. The aim of the program is to provide youth and their families with a vision of hope that diabetes can be prevented through dietary and physical activity changes.

Students in the first through third grade are educated and engaged in the discussion of health and improved nutrition habits. Along with storytelling, students are introduced to Native American language, culture, customs and traditional ways of being active.

More than 1,800 students in more than 10 schools across south central and southeastern Oklahoma have benefited from the Eagle Adventure program since 2010.

The CDC Division of Diabetes Translations' Native Diabetes Wellness Program, in collaboration with the Tribal Leaders Diabetes Committee and Indian Health Service, developed a series of books in response to the burden of type 2 diabetes among Native Americans and the need for prevention materials available children.

Extra books and another book for middle school students are available on the Center for Disease Control's website. Free books are available to order for families and programs serving Native American children.

A toolkit is available on the CDC website to help maximize the use of the Eagle Adventure book series that includes activity sheets, incentives, backdrops, props, games and other materials for the use in the home, schools, or a special event or health

Oklahoma is home to more than 35 federally recognized tribes and has the second largest Native American population in the country, according to the 2010 Census.

Small school takes class on a big trip, jumpstarts learning

MARGARET CARLILE

Reader Submission

STILLWELL, Okla. - A small community school within the Cherokee Nation gave its students a learning boost this summer with a field trip to the U.S. Capitol.

Rocky Mountain School's 8th grade class for the upcoming school year travelled to Washington D.C. the week of July 16th. The students and sponsors spent the week touring historic sites and the locations of the federal government that they have only seen on television.

Seeing such historic sites and visiting the architecturally stunning memorials for men such as Abraham Lincoln, Thomas Jefferson and Franklin Roosevelt brought home to the students how important the achievements of these men are. In addition, a trip to Arlington National Cemetery to see the changing of the guard at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, President Kennedy's grave, and view the rows and rows of grave markers remembering the people who have died serving this nation sent home the message of service and sacrifice.

The students toured the U.S. Capitol Building and entered the gallery of the U.S. House of Representatives while in session. The students also visited a number of memorials honoring our military including the Iwo Jima, Vietnam, Korean, and the new World War II Memorial. The group looked for local soldiers on the Vietnam Wall and some did "rubbings" of the names etched on the black marble walls. The students also enjoyed a number of the Smithsonian Museums, the Supreme Court, the Library of Congress, and other sites in the area. The experience of seeing people from many nations visiting our nation's capital was also impressive to the students, as well as the sheer number and diversity of people seen on the trip. The students also saw David Gregory of NBC's Meet the Press as he was filming in front of the White House.

The trip had been an idea the school had been working toward for a number of years and Superintendent Terry Mays and the School Board-Tonya Tidwell, Angie Dowty, and Lewanda Teehee decided that this year would be a good time to start. The school is the right size to offer opportunities and experiences to students that they would not otherwise have, including travel and Cherokee cultural activities. The school plans to evaluate the trip and consider making it a regular part of instructional activities.

how to pray. Ceremony, some might say, is Inkanish's calling.

Growing up in Anadarko, Inkanish is the son of Joseph and Ruby Ross Inkanish. From the Wichita, Cheyenne and Caddo tribes, he was primarily raised by his grandparents, James Dunlap Inkanish and Mary Little Bear Inkanish. They gained notice as proficient craftspeople with knowledge of tanning and beadwork in a time when the world was eager to learn more of American Indians and their art. The 1977 book Dance Around the Sun tells the story of Mary Inkanish, her work and fame.

Inkanish remembers his grandparents more intimately.

"Grandfather had some history of being a medicine person. They were the two who introduced me to the Circle of Life, but he died when I was little," he said.

When Inkanish talks about the Circle of Life, he isn't exactly referring to the Disney movie The Lion King. It's the sphere of human existence experienced mentally, emotionally, physically and spiritually. In the middle is the Creator. That circle manifests in many ways, such as a powwow with its center drum, he

"Some see it as a social event, which it most certainly it is, but I look at is another form of the Circle of Life," he said. "The drum is the heart, it represents the Creator. I've seen some marvelous activities take place there. I've seen people, who have felt ill, gather in the arena and dance and be around the drum and feel better."

Inkanish finished high school and left an after-school job working the mailroom and press for the Anadarko Daily News to attend Southeastern Oklahoma State University in Durant and study to teach psychology and sociology. Several years later and after a string of enrollment at other schools, he earned his Bachelor of Science in chemical dependency therapy. Inkanish, who is also a U.S. Army Special Forces veteran, has served as director of Tulsa Indian Council on Alcohol and Drug Abuse, worked as consultant to the National Health Institute and National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism and been in private practice for treatment of chemical dependency. He has also served on numerous volunteer boards for groups such as the Tulsa Interfaith Alliance and Mental Health Association of Tulsa.

"I've always had a personal interest in other people's lives – and Indian people in particular having trouble experiencing the world and (using) chemical dependency," he said.

Sometimes it helps to pray for them. Inkanish and his wife Virginia, have been married for 51 or 52 years -neither or them remember exactly. They've lived in Tulsa for 35-40 years. They have three daughters, seven grandchildren and one great-grandchild with two more are on the way.

The family has been a part of the Tulsa Indian Club and the Indian community far back when the Tulsa Powwow was held at Mohawk Park.

"Clark's been involved in the Tulsa Indian Club as long as I can remember," said Anquoe, whose uncle, Kenneth Anquoe, was an original member. "I've always seen him at powwows and various Indian events."

Every year, the club honors an individual or couple and their family to recognize their contributions made to the Indian community. Inkanish was an obvious choice.

"His contribution is long standing, and he's made some definite contributions on an Indian and non-Indian level," Anquoe said. "On a spiritual level, he is one of our elders ... People come to him for guidance, prayers, and he knows the ceremonies."

Although Inkanish has served as a TIC memberandsupporterinvariouscapacitiesover the years, he most relied on to perform prayers at events and to offer cedar ceremoniously for blessing. Friday, Inkanish "cedared" the SpiritBank Event Center arena for the dancing and singing that soon followed.

"All cultures offer prayer of some sort or kind to a deity they relate to," he said. "I believe for the most part prayers are answered, and the answer is in the form of 'yes' or in the form of 'no' or the form of 'wait.' We can readily accept 'yes,' we can be satisfied accepting 'no,' but waiting for a prayer to be answered is more

Accepting patience in wait for an answered prayer is an exercise for the soul. Inkanish is not a medicine man or healer, and he does not hold the answers.

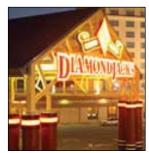

"People make some assumptions that I'm the one who would do that," he said. "All I do is pray. The Creator is the one who takes care of the blessings and answers prayer. All I do is

From the Cheyenne dance grounds near Clinton, Okla., where he was first introduced into the arena and Circle of Life to today, Inkanish looks forward to the Tulsa Powwow every year for the spirit and for more moments he'll never forget, such as one powerful dance in which two elders stood together throughout a particularly energetic song.

"The energy was so unique that when they finished drumming, there was not another song until those two gentlemen separated," he said. "It was so powerful. I'm reluctant to use the word 'powerful.' It makes me cry to think

Chickasaw nominated to succeed Echo Hawk at BIA

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) – Triballeaders and others are praising the nomination of Kevin Washburn, a University of New Mexico Law School dean, to oversee the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs, saying he's well-qualified and understands the issues facing American Indian and Alaska Native communities.

New Mexico U.S. Sens. Jeff

Bingaman and Tom Udall said they would push for the swift confirmation of Washburn in the Senate. Washburn will succeed Larry Echo Hawk, who resigned earlier this year, if the nomination is approved.

"While Kevin will surely be missed on the UNM campus, I have every confidence that he is a great fit for this position," Udall said. Washburn is a citizen of the Chickasaw Nation of Oklahoma and has been UNM law school dean since June 2009. He previously taught at law schools at the University of Arizona and the University of Minnesota and was a visiting professor at Harvard Law School. He was general counsel for the National Indian Gaming commission from 2000 to 2002, and a federal prosecutor in New Mexico from 1997 to 2000.

Washburn said he's deeply honored by the nomination.

"It's an exceedingly important responsibility to serve the nation's Indian tribes and the Indian people," he told the Albuquerque Journal. "It's been very difficult to make the decision to leave New Mexico because I really love the law community here in New Mexico."

Washburn worked with the National Congress of American Indians to develop and pass a federal law aimed at combating crime on reservations, known as the Tribal Law and Order Act. Washburn is known as an

Chickasaw captain led Olympic 'Dream Team'

■ Gold medal basketball 'Dream Team' of 1948 Olympics led by team captain "Cab" Renick

REBECCA AYRESChickasaw Nation

ADA, Okla. – While the late Jim Thorpe is a household name in Oklahoma, the second Native American from Oklahoma to win Olympic gold is not nearly as well known. But that will change to some degree when the late Jesse "Cab" Renick is inducted into the Oklahoma Sports Hall of Fame by the Jim Thorpe Association August 6.

Renick, a Chickasaw and Choctaw who got his start in basketball on a dirt court in Marietta, Okla., led the 1948 U.S. Olympic basketball team to a gold medal.

The 1948 team was known as a team of diversity, with players representing different ages and races from many different areas of the country. Another Oklahoman, Bob Kurland, from Bartlesville, was also on the team. Kurland, one of basketball's first great seven-footers, led Oklahoma A & M to two consecutive NCAA Championships in 1945 and 1946.

"It is significant that Cab Renick won an Olympic gold medal as captain of the team," said Bill Anoatubby, Governor of the Chickasaw Nation. "He was not only a great basketball player known for his energy and enthusiasm; he was a leader on the court. He had a unique ability to unite team members of diverse backgrounds."

As comparisons abound between the 2012 Olympic Basketball Team and the 1992 Olympic Basketball "Dream Team," the 1948 U.S. Olympic team that dominated the basketball competition in London is also gaining some recognition 64-years after the fact

As captain of the squad, Renick led the 1948 team to eight consecutive wins with an average margin of victory of more than 33 points per game.

Most of the players on the U.S. Olympic team 64 years ago were recruited from the Amateur Athletic Union or university squads.

Professional athletes were not permitted in Olympic competition at the time, and professional basketball was in its infancy.

As the Olympic Games got underway, the U.S. team won

NY threatens to shift $47M in tribes' road work

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) – The Cuomo administration is prepared to shift $47 million in planned road and bridge construction on Seneca Indian land to other western New York localities if an ongoing dispute with the tribe isn't resolved quickly, according to a state official.

State Department of Transportation Commissioner Joan McDonald said Thursday that the funds would be reallocated to other road improvement projects if Seneca Indian Nation leaders do not reach an agreement with New York on the $3.4 million fee the tribe is seeking for overseeing improvements to a crumbling 11.5-mile stretch of Interstate 86 on Seneca land.

Seneca President Robert Odawi Porter accused the state of "playing politics with public safety" and urged the federal government to investigate the state's handling of construction projects on Seneca territory.

The Senecas want the state to follow the longstanding practice of paying the tribe administrative fees and for tribal monitors for projects that cross Nation territory. The state has called the VICKSBURG, Miss. (AP) – The owner of casinos in Vicksburg, Miss., and Bossier City, La., has filed for bankruptcy and plans to sell its casinos to an Oklahoma Indian tribe.

Legends Gaming filed Monday for Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization in Shreveport, La. The company plans to sell its DiamondJacks casinos to Global Gaming Solutions for $125 million, said Kym Koch, a spokeswoman for Global Gaming.

The bankruptcy court and state gaming regulators must approve. Legends has the right under the sale agreement to seek buyers willing to pay more. If multiple bidders emerge, the bankruptcy court could hold an auction.

Global Gaming is owned by the Chickasaw Nation of Oklahoma. The company bought Remington Park Racing and Casino in Oklahoma City in 2010 and bought Lone Star Park in Grand Prairie, Texas, in 2011. The tribe also owns 13 casinos in Oklahoma's highly competitive Indian casino market.

Cherokees to appeal UKB trust decision

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON

Native American Times

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. – The Cherokee Nation is appealing the Bureau of Indian Affairs' decision to place 2.03 acres in trust for another Tahlequah-based tribe.

In a statement released July 31, Cherokee Nation Attorney General Todd Hembree refuted last Monday's decision by the federal government that allowsthe United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians to continue operating their Tahlequah casino and gives the smaller tribe co-jurisdiction across 14 northeastern Oklahoma counties.

"I mean no ill will towards our UKB brothers and sisters, or to their government," Hembree said. "However, this land has always been, and always will be, under the jurisdiction of the Cherokee Nation."

The Cherokee Nation has objected to previous attempts by the United Keetoowah Band to place land in trust. Monday's decision came within hours of a casino closure deadline established by a June agreement signed between the United Keetoowah Band and Oklahoma Attorney General Scott Pruitt.

Had the decision not come down Monday, 124 casino employees would have been placed on paid administrative leave through Aug. 24 or until the situation was resolved.

The salaries of an additional 72 tribal government employees in 14 departments are also funded by casino revenue.

At a July 31 press conference, the leadership of the United Keetoowah Band and its casino declined to respond to Hembree's comments other than saying they expected the appeal. Instead, they spoke about the decision itself and what it means for the tribe's 14,600 citizens.

"Now we feel like we're equal (with other area tribes)," Assistant Chief Charles Locust said. "This just gives us the opportunity to show what we can do."

Among the opportunities before the tribe, Locust said, are chances for more funding through federal departments and programs, such as the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

"We're eligible for more grants and services for our people now that we're no longer a landless tribe," Locust said. "That means more jobs, more scholarships, more opportunities to help our people.

"This decision is everything. This is a new day for us."

Impoverished tribe debates development

Tourism is big business for some of the country's best-known Indian tribes, which reap a fortune from casinos and other business ventures.

WOUNDED KNEE, S.D. (AP) – The Oglala Sioux Tribe occupies a seemingly prime piece of South Dakota - a vast, scenic reservation that stands near a crossroads for tourists visiting Mount Rushmore, the Badlands, the historic Old West town of Deadwood and other popular sites.

But don't look for museums. hotels, restaurants or even many bathrooms here on the PineRidgeIndianReservation, because the Lakota make little effort to attract visitors or tourism dollars, despite the fact that they are one of the nation's poorest tribes.

A generation after many other American Indians sought to harness their history for profit, the Oglala Sioux are still debating how much culture they are willing to share.

"When you take a community of people where at one point our language was outlawed and parts of our culture were outlawed, it's hard for us to, I guess, open up to the idea of sharing that in a way to make money off of it," said Nick Tilsen, executive director of Thunder Valley, a nonprofit on Pine Ridge set up to keep traditional Lakota culture alive among young people.

Tourism is big business for some of the country's bestknown Indian tribes, which reap a fortune from casinos and other business ventures.

The Navajo Nation in the Southwest welcomed some 600,000 visitors who spent $113 million last year. In Oklahoma, nearly 45,000 people visited the Cherokee Nation's Heritage Center museum.

But the Oglala Sioux stand apart in southwestern South Dakota. They have just one tribally run casino-and-hotel complex, the Prairie Wind, on the western side of the reservation and recently opened a smaller casino in Martin, a town near the reservation's eastern edge.

The tribe, Tilsen said, is not "totally against" development. "I think we're at the stage of, 'What parts do we want to protect and what parts are we willing to share and what does that look like?"

Some tribal members think the site of the Wounded Knee Massacre, where more than 250 men, women and children were killed by the 7th Cavalry in 1890, should be turned into a tourist attraction with a museum. Others are fiercely opposed to development, saying it would be disrespectful to the dead.

The talk of development "hasn't matured yet," said Ivan Sorbel, executive director of the Pine Ridge Chamber of Commerce.

That doesn't stop people from coming. On a recent afternoon, two carloads of visitors from Texas and Iowa stopped within a 20-minute span to walk through the site, a National Historic Landmark.

The massacre is "one of the greatest crimes in U.S. history," said Gary Bishop, who traveled with his wife from the Dallas area.

But the couple's trip was unlikely to help the reservation much. They were staying at a hotel in Rapid City, about two hours northwest of the site.

Brianne Hawk Wing, an Oglala Sioux tribal member, arrived with her nephew and sister as soon as she saw visitors. Hawk Wing said she has been unable to get a job in tribal government so she sells trinkets such as dream catchers for $20 to tourists at the site.

The tribal and federal governments are the largest employers on the 2.7-millionacre reservation, which includes some of the poorest counties in the U.S. The unemployment rate can be as high as 80 percent. Attracting investors is difficult because tribal members are often suspicious of outsiders.

It's unclear how many tourists visit the reservation or the Wounded Knee site because no one keeps accurate records. Still, many tribal members like Hawk Wing want the site to remain as is.

"See, it's free. No one has to pay for anything," she said as she pointed out where her great-grandfather is buried.

A museum commemorating the massacre was ransacked and its contents lost in 1973. Another museum dedicated to the massacre draws thousands of people annually, but it's 100 miles north of the reservation in Wall, S.D. - also home to Wall Drug, a famous cluster of stores and tourist attractions offering Western kitsch.

The Wall museum is not affiliated with the Oglala Sioux, although co-founder Lani Van Eck said the facility had the blessing of Wounded Knee residents when it opened in 2003. She and the other co-founders decided to build it along busy Interstate 90 to attract more visitors.

Maps are available for anyone who wants to go to the actual site. But the museum doesn't bring revenue or jobs to the reservation, two things the Oglala Sioux are desperate

Also beyond reservation's borders is the Crazy Horse Memorial, which honors the famed Lakota warrior and leader who played a key role in the 1876 defeat of the 7th Cavalry at the Battle of Little Bighorn in Montana. The memorial was started in 1948 and has yet to be finished, but it still draws more than 1 million visitors annually to a site about 20 miles from Mount Rushmore.

Staff members at the memorial and other South Dakota tourist attractions have begun taking part in training led by the Pine Ridge Chamber of Commerce. The goal is to help teach employees about Lakota history so they can share that information with tourists, who, in theory, might then drive to the Pine Ridge reservation.

The future could hold more ambitious projects. In June, the National Park Service and the Oglala Sioux reached a new agreement that calls for creation of the nation's first tribal national park at Badlands National Park an undertaking that might also attract tourists and jobs. Congress still must approve the idea.

The federal government took what is now the South Unit of Badlands National Park from the Oglala Sioux to establish a practice bombing range in the 1940s. It was returned in 1976 and has since been co-managed with the National Park Service.

Plans for the park include a Lakota heritage and education center, a free-roaming bison herd and more roads and trails for visitors.

Staci Eagle spokeswoman for American Indian Alaska Native Tourism Association, said there are more than 500 federally recognized tribes in the United States, and they shouldn't be compared too

"Each tribe defines tourism in its own capacity," she said. "Something that may be acceptable to the Navajo may not be acceptable to the Oglala tribe."

Hospital denies surgical scars say 'KKK'

KRISTI EATON Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) - A lawyer for a Rapid City-area hospital being sued by a blind man who says the letters KKK were carved into his stomach during surgery said the accusations were contrived by other people and that every scar "is explained by the medical procedures that he underwent to save his life," according to court documents filed Wednesday.

Vern Traversie, a 69-year-old Lakota man living on the Cheyenne River Reservation in South Dakota, filed a federal lawsuit last month against Rapid City Regional Hospital, its board of directors, several physicians and others. He claims he was left with scars on his abdomen in the shape of the three letters following heart surgery last year.

YouTube videos featuring Traversie went viral in Native American communities earlier this year. In them, Traversie talks about being mistreated at the hospital and shows his abdomen. Although he is blind, Traversie said he was told by others that the scars form the letters.

A May rally in support of Traversie drew hundreds of people, many of whom said his story exemplifies the racism that Native Americans experience in Rapid City. But others said they couldn't make out the letters, including police who investigated his allegations. No criminal charges were filed.

The defendants in the lawsuit said there is no medical evidence to suggest that anyone burned or cut letters into Traversie.

"Every mark on Plaintiff's abdomen is explained by the medical procedures that he underwent to save his life," Jeffrey Hurd, one of the defendant's lawyers, wrote in response to the lawsuit. "Indeed, the allegations of a 'KKK' scar were apparently created by a group of unqualified people in Plaintiff's home town, who simply discussed why Plaintiff had certain surgical scars."

The lawyer noted that the people who told Traversie about his scars considered several possibilities, including a single "K," a bite mark, the word "oink," or four "K"s, before settling on the three-letter acronym.

"After reaching this decision through speculation and conjecture, and with no attempt to consult with Plaintiff's healthcare providers ... they told Plaintiff that he had been victimized," Hurd wrote.

The hospital also refutes claims that Traversie was denied pain medication, and noted that he was told to have a home health nurse inspect and care for the incisional wounds after he got Reached by phone at his home Wednesday, Traversie said he could not comment on the case and referred questions to his pastor, Ben Farrar, who is acting as his spokesman. Farrar said he wasn't aware of Wednesday's filing but that he expected the hospital to deny the claims.

Farrar said heart surgery patients can expect to be left with a vertical scar down the sternum and a few horizontal scars where drainage tubes would be inserted – as can be seen in photos of Traversie.

"What we cannot expect is haphazard slashes all over the abdomen as well as some cuts that seem to form letters of the alphabet. This is not what can be considered normal," Farrar said, adding that Traversie and his attorney will decide what action to take next.

Native boxer wins Junior Olympic gold

KAREN SHADE

Native American Times

BANNOCK SHOSHONE RESERVATION, Idaho - Roma Pokibro tried boxing because her friend liked it, but the 15-yearold student from Idaho's Shoshone Bannock Reservation has taken her own interest in the sport further than even she imagined.

In June, Pokibro won a gold medal for women ages 15-16 at the USA 2012 Boxing Junior Olympics National Championships in Mobile, Ala. Before that showdown, she surprised everyone, especially herself.

In February, Pokibro was invited as a rising junior amateur in women's boxing to participate in the U.S. Olympic trials in boxing in Spokane, Wash.

"She was taller than me," Pokibro said, remembering her competitor -Alisha Enslen, a two-time champion from Canada.

Enslen may also have been better prepared to fight that day, too. Pokibro was sick from the flu on match day. But after the bout had started, she began to get an idea: "I thought to myself I could win, but I didn't want to get too big headed. I came up with a game plan to keep moving."

Pokibro won by three points.

Boxing season is over and the soonto-be sophomore from Highland Park

High School in Fort Hall, Idaho, turns her attention to other interests. After boxing comes softball followed by basketball.

When school begins, Pokibro will work hard to keep up her grades. She knows she wants to earn a scholarship to a university either by academics, sports or both. But will boxing be a part of that future?

"Yes, I do want to continue," she said. "Even though it's hard, I want to keep doing it so I can go somewhere in life."

Pokibro is the oldest of six children to Ryan and Linda Pokibro. She was always a tomboy who went hunting and fishing with her dad. And it was her dad who convinced her to go out for the football team when at the town's community center. She stopped playing football last year because the boys on the team were beginning to grow stronger than her. That's when she found boxing.

Five years ago, she said she finally convinced her dad Ryan to take her to the boxing room at the town's community center.

Ryan said he has always encouraged her through a philosophy he shares.

"I explained, 'If you're going to do this, you can't quit. Finish it out," he said. "... Don't be a quitter. Just like a new job, you've got to finish it out."

Fortunately, Pokibro liked it and excelled in boxing, studying technique under her coach, Tim Wadsworth, and practicing moves she saw boxers like Mike Tyson work in matches.

Tyson, her dad said, is her favorite. Quickly Wadsworth Pokibro's finesse, strength, speed and smarts in the boxing ring and he trained her to accomplish more. Today, she has won 14 of her 18 matches and looks to do more, perhaps even try for the next summer Olympics.

All the discipline and focus of winning and training hard helps her stand against the peer pressure to take drugs, try alcohol and act in ways that could harm her. It helps that she is driven to make a name for her family and to set a good example to her younger siblings and other youth living on the reservation.

"She's kind of like an old lady already in the way she thinks," said her mom, Linda Pokibro. "She takes care of her brothers and sisters when they need help. I'm so happy and proud. She does what she's supposed to do. Sometimes she gets pressured with sports, but I keep telling her, 'Once you accomplish something, it's going to be easier."

Pokibro has already accomplished much, even if she doesn't believe it herself.

'She doubts herself, but when she boxes, she doesn't," said her father.

And, she has the support of family from all the tribes of which she belongs: Shoshone Bannock, Ponca, Navajo, Arapaho, Northern Cheyenne and Eastern Shoshone of Wyoming. Her family there, her father said, hopes she can visit them to motivate the young people.

The Pokibros also have family Oklahoma, including grandparents, Kay Grant and Susan Freeman of Ponca City.

Whether she goes on to school and a career as an attorney or on to the 2016 Olympics or both, Pokibro will have accomplished one goal for certain she looked forward. Everyone notices, especially her father.

"I pray for the best for her and hope she can excel in everything she can put her mind to," he said.

virtually every game handily. The only exception came in the preliminaries with a narrow 59 to 57 defeat of Argentina.

The margin in other games ranged from 25 points to 65

In eight games that Olympic year, the U.S. scored a total of 524 points while their opponents scored a total of 256 points.

After the games, Renick returned to Oklahoma where he coached four years with the Phillips 66ers - an American Athletic Union team - for four years, winning one National Championship in 1949-50 as a coach. The AAU was pre-NBA where teams competed for national championships. In fact, before being named to the Olympic team, Renick played for the 66ers who won AAU National Championships in 1945-48.

After his start on a dirt basketball court in Marietta, he honed his court skills until his graduation from high school in 1934. He wanted to continue playing basketball, but no college was interested at the

With the country mired in the Great Depression, Renick joined the Civil Conservation Corps and helped construct buildings at Lake Murray State Park. That job also gave him the opportunity to play basketball for the Corps team where he was known as "Point a Minute" Renick.

He was soon recruited by Murray State College, where he played from 1936-38. Oklahoma A&M (now Oklahoma State University) coach Henry Iba heard about Renick and invited him to play for his team. After the first game, Renick was a starter for Oklahoma A&M for the rest of his college career. He played in the 1938-39 season in the new basketball arena now known as Gallagher-Iba Arena.

Throughout his time at the university, Renick was a crowd favorite. According to a press release at the time from Oklahoma A&M, Renick:

"...seemingly performs the work of two players. After he snares the ball off the defensive blackboard, tosses it to a teammate, races ahead down the floor to post position; and, after his club brings the ball up the court, receives a pass for a lay-up and two points."

But it was his experience in London in 1948 that kept people coming to ask about what it was like to compete in the Olympics. In his later years, and living at the Veterans Center in Ardmore, he would keep his Gold Medal in a pouch secured to his wheelchair and would ask people to hold out their hand. When they did, he would plop the medal in their hand and smile because he knew they would ask about it and he could tell them the story of the 1948 Olympic dream

Renick was elected to the American Indian Athletic Hall of Fame in 1973 and the Chickasaw Hall of Fame in 1996. He died on Nov. 29, Ivy League and Friends began in 2008 when SAP invited Harvard officials to speak to the tribal citizens in Durant. The university brought representatives of several of its colleges and its Native American program.

"With the event drawing in over 100 individuals interested in the esteemed university, the SAP recognized the powerful potential of that type of session," said McDaniel. "We saw that it meant a lot to the tribal members to have Harvard come to Durant and they wanted more information about other Ivy League schools, thus the initial Harvard event turned into Ivy League it was "the best way to learn more about and Friends."

When prospective students attend Ivy League and Friends, many opportunities become available to them and they have the freedom to choose which session to attend. Since there was a large number of schools that held these sessions, five sessions were held within a 45-minute time period, the students being able to choose which session most interests them. "We'll support the students no matter where they want to go to college," she said. McDaniel said many college representatives and educational organizations involved with the event will testify about how special it is that the Choctaw Nation is willing to invest in such an event.

"Impressive: that is the one word that comes to mind about the Ivy League college fair," said one representative.

Other college reps called the event "very well organized" and "high class all the way around," saying the event "is one of most well-run and engaging events for Native American students."

McDaniel said admissions officers from various universities advise students to attend college recruitment fairs because they provide an inside track on whether a school is a good fit for the student's goals and gifts, a clear picture of what the different schools look for in an application as well as offer a sense of what funding opportunities might be available and how to take advantage of them.

"Recruitment fairs hosted by Native American organizations also provide a second advantage," said McDaniel. "College representatives at the SAP's events come prepared to speak to Choctaw students. This means that they are better able to tailor their advice and comments to members of the Choctaw community, something students will often miss in their guidance counselor's office and on a standard campus tour."

The SAP encourages the families of high school students to attend Ivy League and Friends, said McDaniel. SAP officials have found that the earlier students learn their options and start setting goals, the better prepared they will be when sending applications.

The 2012 Ivy League and Friends is scheduled for Nov. 10 in Durant at the Choctaw Resort. Pre-registration is recommended, which can be completed through SAP's website, choctawnationsap.com. Call 1-800-522-6170, ext. 2547 or email Scholarship Advisement@ choctawnation.com Interior Secretary Ken Salazar said Washburn would be "an excellent addition to our team.

Rosebud Sioux revitalizing its Native language through dance

KRISTI EATON Associated Press

ROSEBUD, S.D. (AP) - With the Lakota-speaking population rapidly aging and decreasing, the Rosebud Sioux Tribe in South Dakota is trying to encourage young children to take an interest in a language that is, in many ways, secondary

The tribe's Child Care Service's Song and Dance Project aims to teach families how to make colorful, detailed dancing regalia and teaches the intricate dances to the children so they can perform in the annual wacipi,

The hope is that the song and dance will help re-energize both parents' and children's excitement about their culture. It also encourages parents to take an active role in their kids' lives.

"It's putting identity and pride back into the people," said Gale Spotted Tail, director of the Child Care Services.

She said that as the tribe looked at ways to identify how to revitalize the language, they noticed that many tribal members had little interest in learning the Lakota language or taking part in cultural activities. There are fewer than 6,000 Lakota speakers - less than 14 percent of the Lakota population in North and South Dakota, and the average age of a Lakota speaker is 60. One of the biggest challenges to learning Lakota is that there is no agreed-upon orthography, or conventional spelling system.

"We're really looking at what does it take to get people to want to learn and want to be who we used to be?" Spotted Tail said. "A lot of it is instilling that pride and going back into history."

The project also seeks to create unity among the different bands of the Lakota tribes that now live on different reservations,

A handful of employees for the Rosebud Sioux Tribe's project travel to the reservation's various communities for short dance workshops several times a week to teach the kids – from newborns to 17-yearolds - dancing techniques for the annual Wakanyeja Okolakiciye Wacipi. Children can attend one workshop or more.

The dances performed at the wacipis often tell the story of a warrior or hunter searching for enemies. While the babies may not take part in any Fancy Dances - a style of dance that requires stamina and agility because of intense footwork moving their body, or even just their head, to the beat of a drum comes naturally to many of the youngsters, Spotted Tail said.

The wacipi has traditionally played a significant role in Lakota culture as a way to celebrate. Many of the Lakota tribes in South Dakota hold several multiday wacipis throughout the summer that include singing, dancing and other activities to honor their culture.

"They're the next generation," instructor Jerimiah Holly Bull, 27, said of the kids he works with. "They're the ones that are going to carry on our tradition from what our ancestors taught us. We're the ones teaching our little kids so they can teach

Pawnee Nation in dilemma over how to spend settlement money

DANA ATTOCKNIE Native American Times

PAWNEE, Okla. - The $4.4 million is in the bank for the Pawnee Nation of Oklahoma, but deciding how to spend it is proving to be costly because citizens' emotions are high.

The tribe received its share of the $1.023 billion settlement on July 30. However, speculation over how its portion will be spent has some Pawnee citizens concerned ever since learning of it in April.

"Some want to pay off debts. That's not our fault ... some of the debts are mismanagement from ... now they want to pull themselves out of debt by using our money. We want it to be given out per capita for each person," Pawnee elder Lillie Cummings said. "The people are really in an uproar. This is all the talk going on. The tribal people are really upset about it."

Cummings first voiced her opinion about the settlement via a letter in the "Pawnee Chief" newspaper, questioning why people learned of the settlement from state newspapers and not the Pawnee Nation Business Council.

"Is it a secret?" she wrote. "There are all kinds of

Because of a new program launched by the Cherokee Nation, Leafer will get her own home, a locked-in monthly mortgage payment of $350 and another chance to rebuild her life.

Leafer was among seven families who received keys to their new homes last week during a ceremony in Ft. Gibson that kicked off the tribe's initiative. The goal is Mail carrier Erica Leafer got to build 300 houses a year for some of its neediest citizens, and 950 Cherokees are already on a waiting list for the program.

> To qualify, applicants must live in the tribe's 14-county jurisdiction and earn at least $15,000 a year.

> The Tahlequah-based tribe has set up a $5 million revolving fund to finance the homes on a 30-year mortgage. The tribe collects a small interest rate and the loans are guaranteed by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development's Indian Home Loan Guarantee Program.

The Cherokee Nation, the largest Native American tribe in Oklahoma and one of the biggest in the U.S. with more than 300,000 members, is funding the program with money from its general fund, which includes revenue from gaming, land leases and the tribe's other businesses.

"Immediately when we turn the keys over to these families, they have equity in these homes," Cherokee Nation Principal Chief Bill John Baker said in an interview with The Associated Press. "These homes are being built by Cherokees for Cherokees. That's the nation's payoff."

Government won't put liens on divided tribal lands

■ Okla. Rep. Tom Cole calls the move "excellent news for Indian Country."

SUZANNE GAMBOA

WASHINGTON (AP) - Native American tribes don't have to reimburse the government for buying divided-up tribal land so it can be returned to them, the Department of Interior said August 10. The agency has been working with tribes to reunite land that had been divided among multiple owners over many generations. A record $3.4 billion lawsuit settlement approved last year over federal mismanagement of Indian land royalties included $1.9 billion for purchases of the divided-up land. The lawsuit was filed by Elouise Cobell, a Blackfeet Tribe citizen from Browning, Mont., who died last year.

David Hayes, Interior's deputy secretary, said in a letter responding to Rep. Tom Cole, R-Okla., that land purchases made with the money set aside in the settlement are not subject to

"None of the express purposes of the ($1.9 billion) allow for the imposition of liens on tribes to repay the value of lands acquired" by the government to return to tribes, Hayes stated.

"This is excellent news for Indian Country," Cole stated.

The Cobell settlement was reached to compensate tribal citizens for decades mismanagement," Cole said. Applying liens "would be tantamount to requiring tribes to fund the United States government's obligation under settlement," he concluded.

Under a 1983 law, liens could be placed against the land purchased by the government, and tribes would repay the purchase

Buy Indian Act published in Federal Register

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR News Release

WASHINGTON -Assistant Secretary of Indian Affairs Donald E. "Del" Laverdure last week announced that the proposed rule implementing the Buy Indian Act has been published in the Federal Register. The Buy Indian Act provides Indian Affairs with the authority to setaside procurement contracts qualified Indian-owned businesses. This proposed rule describes uniform administrative procedures that Indian Affairs will use in all of its locations to encourage procurement of goods and services from eligible Indian economic enterprises, as authorized by the Buy Indian

"We are working hard to bring to fruition the collaborative efforts of many to put these rules into action," said Laverdure. "There have been several prior proposed rules and consultations but never a final rule. We are committed to finalizing this rule as well as upholding our nation-to-nation relationship in going about this very important task."

The Bureau of Indian Affairs has obtained services and supplies from Indian sources using the Buy Indian Program since 1965, based on policy memoranda. This rule is proposed to describe uniform administrative procedures that the BIA will use in all of its locations to encourage procurement relationships with eligible Indian-owned businesses in the execution of the Buy Indian

This proposal incorporates the Assistant Secretary-Indian Affairs decision to increase economic development and employment of Indian persons by reducing the percentage of Indian ownership of business enterprises from a mandatory 100 percent to minimum 51 percent.

In addition, the regulations respond to and incorporate the nuances of the Section 831 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1991 (10 U.S.C. 2301 note) that amended 25 U.S.C. 47 to allow Indian firms to participate in the Department of Defense's Mentor-Prote'ge' Program and not lose their eligibility for contracts awarded under the authority of the Buy Indian Act. This proposed rule includes language stating that participation in the Mentor-Prote'ge' program has no effect on eligibility for contracts awarded under the authority of the Buy Indian Act.

The proposed rule also includes revisions to address the input received as a result of earlier publications and three consultation hearings in Indian Country.

"We invite tribal leaders and representatives to attend these very important consultations," Laverdure said. "Tribal leaders have worked diligently with Interior in the past on these issues and the intended outcomes are to further enhance tribes' abilities to better develop economic prosperity in Indian Country."

The Department of the Interior proposes to issue regulations guiding implementation of the Buy Indian Act, which provides the Bureau of Indian Affairs with authority to set aside procurement contracts for Indian owned and controlled businesses. This rule supplements the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) and the Department of the Interior Acquisition Regulations (DIAR). Comments must be received on or before September 24, 2012. Tribal consultation meetings to discuss this rule will take place on:

SD judge orders meeting in surgery scars case

RAPID CITY, S.D. (AP) – A judge in a civil lawsuit filed by a Native American man who claims the letters KKK were carved into him following surgery at a South Dakota hospital has ordered the two sides to come together to try to come to a resolution Vern Traversie in the case.

Judge Jeffrey

Viken ordered lawyers for 69-year-old Vern Traversie and lawyers for the defendants in the case to meet by Sept. 7.

Traversie is a 69-year-old Lakota man living on the Cheyenne River Reservation in South Dakota. Traversie has sued Rapid City Regional Hospital, the hospital's board of directors and several others claiming the three letters were left on his abdomen following heart surgery.

Though he is blind, Traversie says others have told him the scars left after his heart surgery form the letters.

Native American groups wary of proposal to give state control over workforce funds

JAIME ADAME Urban Tulsa Weekly

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. - The shy smile from K. C. Warledo didn't match the gravity of her response when asked where she'd be without Job Corps.

"Honestly, I think I'd be homeless," said Warledo, 19.

The self-described 10th-grade dropout of Cheyenne heritage is among the nearly 250 youth who live and learn at the Talking Leaves Job Corps Center, a residential training program in Tahlequah.

Operated by the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma and funded by the U.S. Department of Labor, the center's population isn't limited to Native Americans, though it is one of only a few centers nationally run by Native American tribal groups.

But the center and several other workforce training programs operated by Oklahoma tribal groups may be swept up in political activity aimed squarely at streamlining federal workforce development programs. Not including the costly Job Corps program, Native American groups in northeast Oklahoma last year directly received more than $3 million in federal funds for workforce development programs for both youth and adults.

Proposed legislation would streamline an area of government that has overlap between programs, according to reform backers, who note that a reform bill has already been revised to give more money to American Indian programs.

Opposed to the legislation is The National Indian and Native American Employment and Training Conference, which describes itself as "the largest and most representative national Indian and Native American employment and training association." The group has declared a "call to action" against legislation introduced in the U.S. House of Representatives.

The measure, known as the Workforce Investment Improvement

Act of 2012, would strengthen the state's role in allocating workforce development funds to the detriment of Native Americans, according to the group.

The bill was introduced by U.S. Rep. Virginia Foxx (R-NC), U.S. Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon (R-CA) and U.S. Rep. Joe Heck (R-NV).

Foxx's press secretary, Ericka Perryman, said that concerns of American Indian groups don't properly take into account changes in the legislation made during committee sessions.

"In fact, the legislation increases workforce development funding training programs. "It is important for us that we continue these types of programs without anything that would hamper what we're doing now.

Northeast Oklahoma, said relying on the state would be bad for her group.

distribution would also be a practical

We feel like this would," Tiger said. Helen Christie, executive director for the Inter-Tribal Council of

"It's an issue that's a threat to our tribal sovereignty and our ability to serve the needs of our people, because we already deal with limited funding the way it is," said Christie.

Giving funds to the state for disadvantage, according to Christie.

Nation received almost $140,000 in WIA funding 2011, according to government records.

"We don't think it has too much of a chance to get through the Senate," White said.

However, the criticism is also coming closer to home. Sen. Tom Coburn released a scathing report July 24 critiquing job training programs in Oklahoma, echoing some of the criticisms put forth by fellow Republican lawmakers.

Kim Carroll, director of grants and compliance for the career services division of the Cherokee Nation, said criticism in the report was off-base when describing bi-weekly payments at the Talking Leaves Job Corps

Students receive up to $50, with the amount increasing the longer a student is in program, which Coburn characterized as an incentive to stay rent-free in the program.

Carroll, however, said the payments encourage the youth -- participants range in age from 16 to 24 -- to complete their high-school diploma in addition to finishing vocational training in fields like health care or culinary arts.

The Cherokee Nation, which receives about $1.8 annually in WIA funds, opposes the House legislation, Carroll said. About 6,400 people pass through the Cherokee Nation's career services division yearly, some to merely get an assessment done and others to take part in career training.

"We always have a waiting list for vocational training," said Carroll.

Tiger said that the recent economic recession has been difficult for wouldbe workers. A recent analysis by the Economic Policy Institute described higher unemployment rates for American Indians than whites. In a three-state region including Oklahoma, American Indians had an unemployment rate of 12 percent in the first half of 2010, compared to a 7.1 percent unemployment rate for whites in the same region.

Christie said her group is receiving just over $90,000 this year, less than in the past.

"I'm receiving $6,000 less this year. We keep getting cut, and so our resources are dwindling," she said. She said her group, based in Miami, works to develop training

"Those services, they are defined by the needs of the area. ... We look at different businesses that the tribes are developing," Christie said.

that's relevant to the local economy.

She said opportunities for training are given out on a first-come, firstserve basis.

"Usually within the first month of the program, I've reached my quota for the whole year," Christie said.

She said she's been doing this type of work since 1988, and has seen a similar pattern with the state taking over programs once run by an American Indian group.

In the 1990s, her group ran adulteducation classes.

"Ours was five days a week, four hours a day, but the one the state does is just two nights a week," Christie said, adding that enrollment is limited.

For those calling for reform, the issue is also about properly evaluating the effectiveness of programs,

"Under current law, the Secretary of Labor operates the Native American Employment and Training program, which is subject to the House and Senate Appropriations Committees," Perryman wrote, noting that a recent Government Accountability Office report "found the federal government hasn't studied the effectiveness of this program in almost nine years."

Perryman wrote that directing limited funds to programs that "don't necessarily work" is a "great disservice" to Indian tribes.

Christie had her own way of evaluating the last several years: "We've had to do more with less resources," she said.

dedicated solely to Native Americans by more than 150 percent," Perryman wrote in a statement.

Regardless of any tweaks to the bill, local tribal leaders also expressed worry about any changes to the current system.

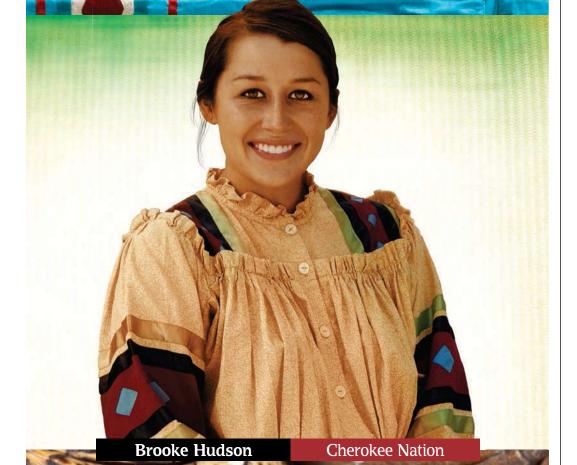

"We've been monitoring it real close. We are concerned," said Principal Chief George Tiger of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation.

Tiger said the money goes to

"They say that it would streamline the workforce development programs. In actuality, the belief among grantees in the Native American program is that they're not set up to handle the influx of workers or participants that would be coming in," Christie said. "There's a concern that the state taking control of that, that they wouldn't be able to adequately serve the Native American population."

Bacone College ending nursing degree program

The 37 second-year students currently enrolled in the program have until July 31, 2013 to complete their coursework.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

MUSKOGEE, Okla. - A historically American Indian college is ending one of its nursing programs.

After a six-month review, Bacone College's Board of Trustees voted Aug. 3 to discontinue the school's associate of applied science in nursing degree program, effective July 31, 2013.

The review comes on the heels of the Oklahoma Board of Nursing giving the program's accreditation a one-year "conditional approval" in November 2011. Citing four areas of primary concern, including high faculty turnover, a low graduation rate and a low pass rate on the National Council Licensure Exam for registered nurses, the probationary period began on Feb. 1.

The program will remain fully funded and staffed for the 2012-2013 school year. The 37 second-year students currently enrolled in the program have until July 31, 2013 to complete their coursework. According to the school's website, no firstyear students were admitted to the program for the fall 2012 semester in accordance with the Oklahoma Board of Nursing's recommendations.

For candidates who do not finish their coursework by July 31, 2013, a spokeswoman for Bacone College said the school could provide a list of other ADN programs across Oklahoma, but students would be responsible for checking whether they qualify for admission. Nineteen other Oklahoma schools offer ADN programs accredited through the state's nursing board, including Connors State University's Muskogee campus.

After July 2013, the associate degree program's resources and three full-time faculty members will be moved over to the school's bachelor's degree nursing program.

"American Indians will be able to complete the RN to BSN degree completion program in areas where this program has been needed but not locally available," nursing department chairwoman Kathryn Bible said. "Bacone has received requests from Alaska, for instance, to offer the RN to BSN program but it was difficult to fulfill those because of the energy and resources it takes for the ADN program."

Launched in 1999, Bacone's RN to BSN degree program is one of seven in Oklahoma that is only open to registered nurses with an active nursing license. Participants can either take their classes completely online or through a mix of traditional and online courses.

Founded in 1880 by missionary Almon C. Bacone as Indian University, Bacone College offers associate's and bachelor's degree programs to all academically qualified students, but maintains a special emphasis on the needs of American Indian

"Part of Bacone College's mission is 'serving American Indian students within a culturally diverse community," Bible said. "Our focus for the Bacone College Department of Nursing will move towards growth in our RN to BSN degree completion program, including more involvement with American Indian colleges and communities."

Delegates to the second annual Native American Youth Leadership Day take a break before beginning their scavenger hunt on the Northern Oklahoma College Tonkawa campus. NORTHERN OKLAHOMA COLLEGE

TONKAWA, Okla. - Approximately 200 youth, tribal educators and sponsors from seven North Central Oklahoma tribes gathered on the Northern Oklahoma College Tonkawa campus for "Motivation on the Rezervation," the second annual Native American Youth Leadership Day.

Wearing color-coded T-shirts indicating their tribal affiliations, youngsters from the Kaw, Osage and Pawnee Nations and the Iowa of Oklahoma, Otoe-Missouria, Ponca and Tonkawa tribes spent the day learning tips for developing Native pride and leadership and enjoying various games and activities. A scavenger hunt. designed by Gloree Tah and Elsie Whitehorn of the Otoe-Missouia Tribal Education Office to acquaint them with NOC, sent teams on a quest to find and photograph various places on the Dynamic sessions by Chance Rush, founder of Cloudboy Consultants, LLC of Tulsa, along with hip hop recording artist and disc jockey Emcee One (Marcus Anthony Guinn), of Osage heritage, and activist Chief Swagg (Jeffrey Duarte), an Aquinnah Wampanoag from Aquinnah, Mass., gave the attendees insights on bullying and conflict resolution, communication and presentation, culture outlook and issues and relationships. Lindsey Miner and Samantha Ephgrave of the Noble County OSU Extension Service gave a workshop for seventh through ninth graders titled "Success: There's an app for that!" while Karen Howe, Kaw Nation education director, teamed with NOC staff to present "College Prep" to the tenth through twelfth graders.

Rush, who has ties to Pawnee and to Red Rock (he is an Otoe descendant and the son of Donna Rush/ Sweezy, a "Red Rock Rocket grad," exhorted his listeners to "get outside your comfort zone. "People treat you on how you present yourself and how you act," he said. The future tribal leaders were advised that communication is key in their development and to take advantage of the opportunity to present themselves on Twitter and Facebook, keeping in mind that colleges and employers look at the posts.

"Find and use your talents for personal growth," Rush urged. "The Creator gave you something. It's up to you to utilize it." He emphasized the importance of focusing on greatness and ignoring negative comments. "You must grab hold of who you are to grab hold of who we [Native Americans] are to make change in your world. We're still here and have the opportunity to do great things," he stated.

One way to make change now is to stop bullying, "an epidemic we can control," Rush said. "If you see someone bullied, be there for them—stand by them. If you are the bully, get help." He predicted that when young adults strive to be the very best, bullying and suicide will decrease.

Emcee One invited the young people to list items that could influence their beliefs. They learned that incorrect data in the belief system could lead to poor life choices. "It all hinges on whether you have a lie or truth in your belief system," he said. "You have to untie a lie with truth. Truth is fair. It can't be bribed or bartered." He urged them to become truth chasers and to chart their lives by the truth.

Noting that most substance abuse and suicide result from broken relationships, Emcee One changed the word "Intimacy" to "Into me see," meaning that persons must understand themselves and each other before making a commitment. They must treat each other with respect. "Commitment has to be balanced with 'into me see," he said. "There is no right to intimacy without commitment."

Offering the Opening Prayer as well as a prayer before lunch was Pastor James White of the Ponca Indian United Methodist Church in White Eagle.

The event concluded with games and a hip hop showcase conducted by Chief Swagg and Emcee One. Gina Conneywerdy, NOC Native American counselor, and educational directors of the seven tribes involved coordinated the leadership day. Virginia Combrink, M.Ed, director of the Ponca Tribal MSPI Oo-kee-he (Able to Achieve) Program, provided backpacks for each participant. Garland Kent, Jr. and Elsie Whitehorn designed the custom T-shirts.

chief last year, campaigned on a platform that called for improving tribal social programs. The tribe once had a similar homebuilding program, Baker said, but other funding priorities won out over the past decade.

"All of a sudden, they built fewer and fewer houses," said Baker, who was a longtime tribal councilman before he became chief. "I think it was short-sighted, and I tried time and again to get them to see the wisdom of building homes. You're creating wealth for the people."

Baker said he hopes the tribe can increase the homes built from 300 to 365 a year – one house a day.

Melissa Patterson, 42, a reading teacher who works another job as a store clerk to make ends meet, had been sweating out the summer with her three kids in the two-bedroom home she rented until she found out she would be among the first citizens to get a new home.

"My kids have never had a room of their own," Patterson said. "I've never had a brand new home. My family's excited."

All Oklahoma counties under outdoor burn ban

Gov. Mary Fallin issued a statewide Burn Ban on Aug.
3. This ban supersedes all county burn bans currently in place and remains in place until conditions improve and it is removed by the governor.

Officials say trash burning sparked fire

State-issued burn bans do not apply to tribal land, although tribes typically cooperate with local entities and issue their own burn bans if conditions are dangerous.

SEAN MURPHYAssociated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) – A massive wildfire in northeast Oklahoma that burned for days, destroyed dozens of homes and scorched more than 90 square miles likely started with two people illegally burning trash in rural Creek County, authorities said last week.

Meanwhile, investigators suspect arson was the cause of two separate wildfires last week near Luther and Norman that also burned dozens of square miles and resulted in at least one death.

The investigation into the Creek County fire is being done with the Bureau of Indian Affairs because there is some dispute about whether the fire started on tribal land, Creek County Sheriff's Lt. Charles Redfern said.

Redfern said investigators have talked to two people who were burning trash in a rural area between Bristow and Drumright. The governor issued a statewide burn ban the following day, but a county ban had been in place since July 5. Redfern declined to release the names of the suspects but said they could face criminal charges.

State-issued burn bans do not apply to tribal land, although tribes typically cooperate with local entities and issue their own burn bans if conditions are dangerous, said Chief George Thurman, of the Sac & Fox Nation.

"We control our own lands, so we say what happens on it," Thurman said. "But most of the time, we're cooperative with local law enforcement and fire departments."

Separate wildfires that broke out late last week in far southeast Norman are being investigated as suspicious in nature, Assistant State Fire Marshal JoAnne Sellars said. Norman officials asked her office to help with the investigation, and she said an agent has determined where the fires started but how they started is still under investigation.

Sellars said one fire started Aug. 3 along Cemetery Road and 126th Avenue in rural Cleveland County. Two more fires started the next day along Cemetery Road a little more than one mile away.

Firefighters discovered a badly burned body among the remains of a burned out home near where the fires originated. The state medical examiner's office is using dental records to determine the victim's identity.

District Attorney Greg Mashburn said that if the fire was intentionally set, the suspect could face numerous charges, including felony murder.

"Any time that injuries occur or lives are threatened, it aggravates the charges and could result in additional charges beyond arson," Mashburn said.

Oklahoma County authorities also suspect an arsonist was to blame for a fire near Luther that burned more than 4 square miles over the weekend. Witnesses reported seeing someone throwing newspapers from a black Ford pickup truck after setting them on fire.

"I just come off the turnpike. I was following a truck; he was up in the distance," a 911 caller said in an audio recording of the call released by the Oklahoma County Sheriff's Office. "He took off, it was a bluish-black truck. He turned around in the middle of the road, and I got up here where he was at and the whole woods exploded when I got up to him. ...

"It's a grass fire. He threw something out."

Sheriff's spokesman Mark Myers said authorities set up a tip line and are seeking any information connected to the fires.

"It's tough when all you have is a vague description," Myers said. "That's why we're really depending on the public to come forward with some information."

Mold discovery prompts closure of Sallisaw clinic

SALLISAW, Okla. (AP) – The Cherokee Nation says it's closed part of a Sallisaw health center because mold was discovered in the building.

The Southwest Times Record reports that several services normally offered at the Redbird Smith Health Center will be moved to the Redbird Smith Health Center Annex.

Tribal officials say an environmental assessment is under way to determine the extent of the suspected mold. The tribe says the exposure to mold was minimal for patients and staff.

The tribe says dental services will be unavailable while the clinic is closed. Patients who normally use the Redbird clinic are asked to go to facilities in Stilwell, Muskogee or Tahlequah.

cost with money earned from the land. The money then went toward buying other divided tribal land.

John Dossett, general counsel for National Congress of American Indians, said the divided-up land is costly for the federal government to administer. He said his organization and many tribes are glad liens won't be applied.

According to the Interior Department, any money the tribes earn from the land, from grazing or timber sales, for instance, will now go to the tribe that owns the parcel.

The divisions of tribal lands began under the 1887 Dawes Act, which split reservations into individual allotments that were passed on to multiple heirs with each passing generation.

The law's aim was to "assimilate" tribal citizens into the rest of society and eliminate tribes. Some land now has anywhere from dozens to more than 1,000 individual owners. The Interior Department has identified 88,638 land tracts owned by nearly 2.8 million people. The divided-up land is also known as "fractionated" land.

The federal government wants to reduce the numbers of land tracts and owners over the next decade. The plan is to buy tracts with the most individual owners, finding landowners willing to sell and targeting land that can be bought with little preparatory work and where controlling interest can be gained.

Tribes had asked for liens to be waived.

The $1.9 billion from the lawsuit settlement is a one-time expenditure that must be spent within 10 years. Any money not spent in 10 years will be returned to the U.S. Treasury.

USDA announces assistance for socially disadvantaged farmers, ranchers

WASHINGTON - Agriculture Secretary Vilsack announced last week the award of 70 grants to tribes, educational institutions and non-profit organizations across the country to conduct training, outreach and technical assistance for socially disadvantaged farmers, ranchers, and landowners. The awards are being made through the Outreach Assistance to Socially Disadvantaged Farmers and Ranchers (OASDFR) Competitive Grants Program, known as the "2501 program."

"USDA continues working to help improve the success of minority farmers and ranchers in today's agricultural economy," said Vilsack. "These grants provide crucial assistance to help institutions who are helping American producers build capacity and increase profitability, and thereby create stronger rural communities."

As authorized in the 2008 Farm Bill, the grants awarded today will bring $19 million in new and additional funding to programs and organizations to bolster assistance for socially disadvantaged farmers, ranchers and forest landowners. Grants will enable recipients to work with prospective farmers as they acquire, build and operate farms and ranches, revitalize the rural economy, and create new, sustainable economic opportunities in the region and nation.

Recipients include new awardees and qualifying programs and organizations that have previously benefited from Department assistance.

Some council members say they are going to invest it or pay tribal debts. If so, we want to know how much in debt we are. Exactly what programs are in debt?"

Cummings also submitted a petition to the Pawnee Nation Business Council on May 23 asking for the money to be distributed equally to citizens.

"The settlement is based on all Pawnee tribal allotments, right of ways, farming and grazing and oil and gas leases that were mismanaged by the U.S. government. Our ancestors suffered and sacrificed for these lands, and we, as their descendents, want what is rightfully ours. Some council members have stated that they want to use it to pay off tribal debts. Some of which we feel could also be from mismanagement.

This settlement was awarded to the Pawnee tribe people, not the tribal council," the petition states.

Cummings said the petition was turned in with 220 signatures. However, she continues to receive more. "People are still sending the petition in and wanting to sign it. They want to sign it even though I've already given it to the tribal council, which they more or less ignored," she said

Pawnee Nation Vice President Charles Lone Chief received the petition because President Marshall Gover was not at the May 23 council meeting. Cummings said she and fellow petitioners are awaiting a decision.

"There hasn't been anything done on the petition. I was out on medical leave when that petition was turned in, and technically I haven't seen it. I believe it's been forwarded to the (tribe's) attorney general ... the constitution doesn't really address a petition of that type," Gover said. "Right now the tribal council has been talking, kicking around several different ideas. They haven't come to any conclusion yet."

When Cummings didn't get a response from the business council, she said she sought help from the tribe's Nasharo Council, or Chiefs Council. It, in turn, requested a joint meeting with the business council. A meeting was originally scheduled for June 16 but didn't happen. Another joint meeting to discuss the use of the settlement funds is scheduled for 2 p.m. Aug. 18 in the Roam Chief

According to the Pawnee Nation website, tribal citizens can submit ideas on how to spend the funds via email to communications@pawneenation.org.

Gover said there would also be a public forum so citizens can offer ideas. He said there were no terms dictated in the litigation on how the funds should be spent, and the money is sitting in an interest-bearing account. He said he received a phone call telling him the money was in the account, but written confirmation wasn't received until July 30.

"We haven't touched a dime of it. We're only the caretakers of it. It's not the councils money ... every dime will be accounted for," Gover said. "Don't always listen to the ones that spread rumors. Just come to the office and find out the truth."

Pawnee Nation Executive Director Dawna Hare said there have been discussions at previous council meetings and the initial suggestions were for a per capita payment, but now she said the ideas are focused on education, the youth and infrastructure.

"I think the council is really looking to get a lot of ideas and input from the tribal members. We want to make a good decision because ... they're not going to get this kind of settlement again," Hare said. "This is an opportunity to infuse some funds into the tribe ... make a good decision on how the money will be used to have a lasting effect."

Pawnee citizen Kim Mirri said she doesn't want the settlement spent on paying fines or projects such as an unfinished bridge that some citizens call the "Bridge to Nowhere."

"Right now, there's unemployment. People don't have jobs. There's elders out there, I know, that can't pay their electric bill. They can't get their glasses. They can't get hearing aids. I mean, they're just holding this money back, and I know there are children that need clothes for school. A lot of people don't have jobs. I don't understand why they want to do this and sit on this money," Mirri said. "I was in the business meeting and I heard them, they had dreams for it and some of these dreams aren't realistic."

Mirri quoted Gover from a Pawnee newsletter in which he stated, "The Pawnee business council is formulating the best plan for the use of this money." She said each citizen could receive approximately $1,300 in a per capita payment if the settlement is divided between its approximate 3, 470 citizens.

"I'm tempted to write these people in Washington because we're not benefiting from their funding," she said. "We are fighting over here. Fighting for that money that could really benefit our people. There's not very many of us ... we really need it. Our economy is so bad ... I hope that everything works out good."

Mirri also said she wants the Pawnee Nation to vote where there money should go. Gover said, "That hadn't really been planned out yet."

Another detail that's undecided is the tribe's payment to the Native American Rights Fund for representing it in the litigation. Hare said NARF just asked the tribes for a 10 percent donation.

"As of yet there hasn't been any payment made to NARF, and there hasn't been any decision made," Gover said. "Anytime that you get money, it's a blessing and it's up to us to make sure it's a blessing and not a hindrance. So it's up to the tribal council to make sure that money goes to the best possible way ... and that's a big responsibility for the tribal council. Because no matter what we do with it, you know, we're not going to make everybody happy ... I hope it makes life better for each and every one some way somehow."

Hare said tribes involved in the lawsuit were bound by confidentiality agreements so no information was released until April 11. That's when the Obama administration announced the settlement. The Pawnee Nation is the only Oklahoma tribe in the settlement.

According to news reports, the Colville Tribe received $193 million with approximately $39 million going to its citizens. An additional 30 percent of its settlement will be voted on, which could allow for citizens to receive 50 percent of the $193 million. The Coeur d'Alene Tribe received $18 million, but its leaders did not say how it will be spent. The Nez Perce Tribe received $33.7 million. It is giving NARF $3 million and each of its 3,500 citizens will receive approximately $8,600.

Just to make sure everyone is on the same page, the Native world view is circular. Under the greatest sphere in the galaxy, the sun, we pitch our tents to live in deference to this prevalent orb. Without it, we could not define ourselves or recall our ceremonies.

But I am not so sure how a drought figures into the grand scheme. Drought is one of those things like a chimera, a mythological but deadly creature. When the circumstances are right (no rain plus extended basting trends) it makes an appearance with humankind in full thrall. ### Commission moves forward with DOI trust management review

WASHINGTON - A federal commission tasked with reviewing Department of Interior practices is getting its policies in place and moving forward with its critique.

Established in December 2009 and staffed in November 2011, the National Commission on Indian Trust Administration and Reform has 24 months to evaluate the Department of Interior's management and administration of its nearly $4 billion in trust assets and recommend potential improvements.

"We need to develop what the relationship between the federal government, Indian Country is and what it means," commission chairwoman Fawn Sharp of the Washington-based Quinault Indian Nation. "We are trying to get the tribal perspective and incorporate it into this."

In an effort to get that perspective, the five commissioners have participated in individual outreach efforts across Indian Country, as well as hosting public meetings and webinars, including one Aug. 13 about developing the commission's own policies for outreach and documenting public feedback.

"I'm looking forward to hearing what the DOI thinks is the most urgent," commissioner Anderson from the Bois Forte Band of Minnesota Chippewas said

Monday. "I heard lot of comment from people on my travels about land consolidation program once Cobell takes effect. We need to grab hold of these specific issues and get things out there through a request for public input so people can tell us if we're on track or off base."

In wake of teen suicides, Apache journey to Florida to learn ancestors' story of sacrifice

LANE DeGREGORY Tampa Bay Times

AUGUSTINE, Fla. (AP) - In the front of the charter bus, the two tribal elders were dozing. They had flown in from their New Mexico reservation late the night before and risen early to take the kids on this field trip. They had to save their strength to share their story.

The teenagers crowded the back of the bus, pressed against the wide windows, taking pictures: a palm tree, a giant golf ball, a statue of Mickey Mouse. "Where's the beach?" a boy in a white cowboy hat kept asking. "I want to go to the never been to a beach, flown on a plane or seen anywhere as flat as Florida. They grew up on 700 square miles of mountains and Ponderosa pines, in FEMA trailers and cramped government houses.

The teenagers had come to Orlando for a mental health conference that would begin the next day. The elders had made them bring their ribbon shirts and camp dresses. But on this steamy July morning as the bus rumbled onto the interstate, the students had no idea where they were headed.

"Are we there yet?" asked the boy in the cowboy hat. His name is Tralin Enjady and he's 12. "Where are we going?"

The counselors wouldn't answer.

They knew this journey was going to be hard.

But if these young Apache could confront their past, if they could walk in the strained steps of their ancestors and feel the thick walls of the fort closing in, maybe they'd feel some pride and the elders wouldn't have to bury any more kids.

Pointing to the importance of sacred sites to religious and cultural practices, the department is aiming to develop some kind of uniform policy for addressing the protection of such sites. That could mean a consultation policy specific to sacred sites or changes in law that would allow for greater protections, officials said.

Rehearing sought in Native American adoption case

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) - The South Carolina parents who adopted a Native American girl have asked a high court to reconsider its decision to send her back to Oklahoma.

Court officials confirm that the adoptive parents on Friday asked the South Carolina Supreme Court to rehear their case.

Last month, the court voted 3-2 to return the now-2-year-old girl to her biological father in Oklahoma. In its first decision weighing state adoption law against the federal Indian Child Welfare Act, the court wrote the adoptive family likely bonded in their time together but that the federal law gives custodial preference to the girl's father, a member of the Cherokee tribe.

No further details about the request were immediately available, and it wasn't clear when the court would decide if it would rehear the case.

Artist shows off bobbleheads at Santa Fe Indian art market

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - Google "bobbleheads," and you'll come up with everyone from Einstein to Joe DiMaggio.

These pop culture mainstays have been around for at least 150 years, according to bobbleheads.com. In the 1920s, a New York Knicks basketball player bobblehead launched an avalanche of sports-related figures. All of the toys contained springconnected heads that bounced and nodded at the touch of a finger. By the 1970s, a bobblehead set of the Beatles became one of the most famous and rare of all time.

Cherokee Chief won't veto hiring bill

■ Although at least two councilors alluded to potential legal action while debating the bill on Aug. 13, no one has filed suit in tribal court as of close of business Aug. 17.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON

Native American Times

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. — A bill passed by the Cherokee Nation Tribal Council on Aug. 13 targeting non-Cherokee citizens in administrative positions will not be vetoed.

Despite a previous vow to veto the bill, Principal Chief Bill John Baker issued a statement last Friday afternoon that he would not take any action on it, citing an opinion issued Aug. 10 by Attorney General Todd Hembree and assistant Attorney General Robert Garcia stating the bill violates two clauses of the tribe's constitution, including the separation of powers clause.

"As the legislation passed requiring specific hires by the office of the chief is unconstitutional as determined by the nation's attorney general, I see no reason to sign it or veto it," Chief Baker said. "If the Council cares to challenge the separation of powers and work to diminish the stature and independence of the executive branch, then courts are the proper recourse."

Although at least two councilors alluded to potential legal action while debating the bill on Aug. 13, no one has filed suit in tribal court as of close of business Friday.

Sponsored by council member Dick Lay of Ochelata, Okla., the legislation specifically targets five positions: chief executive officer of Cherokee Nation Businesses, general counsel to the principal chief, executive director of communications, executive director of government relations and chief of staff.

According to the Cherokee Nation constitution, any bill not signed within five days of receipt in administration is automatically enacted. This legislation was enacted with an emergency clause, which means it goes into effect immediately, but will not be applied retroactively to existing contracts.

Of the five positions listed in the bill, four are within Baker's administration. They are not specifically mentioned in the tribe's constitution and are not subject to confirmation by the Tribal Council.

At the time of the bill's passage, chief of staff was the only position staffed by a Cherokee Nation citizen, with Chuck Hoskin Sr., filling the

On Aug. 16, Amanda Clinton, director of communications for Cherokee Nation Businesses, replaced former Osage Nation chief Jim Gray as communications director. A Cherokee Nation citizen originally from Kenwood, Okla., Clinton will maintain her title with CNB while overseeing the tribe's communications department.

A spokeswoman for Cherokee Nation confirmed Saturday night via e-mail that Gray is still executive director of government relations and Free is still under contract with Cherokee Nation and CNB. Free's new title was not disclosed.

Free and Gray declined to comment on the legislation and Hoskin Sr. could not be reached.

The Cherokee Nation and CNB both employ Cherokee-preference in their hiring processes. As of Aug. 13, more than two-thirds of Cherokee Nation Businesses' employees are Cherokee citizens.

CNB's board of directors is in the process of reviewing applications for a successor to former CEO David Stewart. Interim CEO and Executive Vice President Shawn Slaton is not a Cherokee Nation citizen. Requests for comment from Slaton and CNB board chairman Sam Hart were not returned.

As of the council's last Rules Committee meeting on July 26, 225 applications had been received for the position, but according to Speaker Tina Glory-Jordan, fewer than 10 were from Cherokee Nation

"Normally we do not step on hires made by the principal chief," atlarge council member Julia Coates said during debate at the Aug. 13 Tribal Council meeting. "However, I believe the positions described in this legislation should be held by citizens."

Along with Coates and Lay, councilors Buel Anglen, Jack Baker, Cara Cowan Watts, Jodie Fishinghawk, Don Garvin, Lee Keener and David Thornton voted for the bill. Councilors Glory-Jordan, Joe Byrd, Meredith Frailey, Janelle Fullbright, Frankie Hargis, Chuck Hoskin Jr., Curtis Snell and David Walkingstick voted against it, with several citing constitutionality

"I believe it (the bill) is unconstitutional, as the executive power is vested with the principal chief," Frailey said. "It is within his realm to appoint, employ and nominate candidates he considers capable of performing responsibilities.

"This act will set a precedent. If the Tribal Council requires administrative positions to be enrolled Cherokee Nation citizens, should we require the legislative branch to do that? The judicial branch? Our business entities? I understand and respect the intent behind this, but I disagree and think we are overreaching."

Poarch Creek casino draws criticism from Creek Nation

WETUMPKA, Ala. proposed casino expansion by the Poarch Band of Creek Indians has come under fire from another tribe over concerns of grave exhumation.

The Muscogee (Creek) Nation, headquartered in Okmulgee, Okla., is protesting the location of the Alabama tribe's proposed $246 million expansion project, claiming it desecrates Hickory Ground, the last pre-removal capital of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation National Council. In 2007, the two tribes signed a memorandum of understanding that the grounds, which were added to the National Register of Historic Places in 1980, would be preserved "in perpetuity."

"The Muscogee (Creek) Nation is committed to protecting the burial and ceremonial grounds of our ancestors," Principal Chief George Tiger said. "We have attempted to convey to the Poarch Band why it is wrong to disturb the peace of our ancestors and burial grounds. However, the Poarch Band does not seem to share our cultural values and respect our traditional

In a statement released Aug. 12, the Poarch Band of Creek Indians denied the Oklahoma tribe's concerns, claiming the proposed site is outside the ceremonial grounds.

"As an Indian nation with close cultural, if not familial ties to the Muscogee Nation, we are disappointed by recent statements that do not accurately reflect Poarch's efforts to maintain the site and preserve a relationship with the Muscogee Nation," Robbie McGhee, the tribe's treasurer and head of the government affairs office, said. "We have honored our agreement to preserve the ceremonial ground, just as we honor the history and cultural significance of our shared heritage."

The expansion project includes plans for a 20-story hotel with 285 rooms, a full-scale casino with more than 2,500 electronic gaming machines, a resort-style pool and space for live entertainment.

The only federally-recognized tribe in Alabama, the 3,000-citizen Poarch Band of Creek Indians also operates casinos in Montgomery, Ala., and Atmore, Ala.

Osage voters reject proposed constitutional amendments

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON

Native American Times

PAWHUSKA, Okla. — Osage voters rejected four proposed Constitutional amendments Aug. 13.

In order to be adopted, each amendment had to receive at least 65 percent of the vote. Although each amendment received at least 50 percent, none received the required supermajority.

The results became official Aug. 17 after unanimous acceptance by the Osage Nation Election Board.

Absentee ballots outnumbered in-person votes by an almost 2-to-1 margin. Among the 1,479 ballots cast, 455 were cast in person Aug. 13 at the tribe's Congressional Chambers.

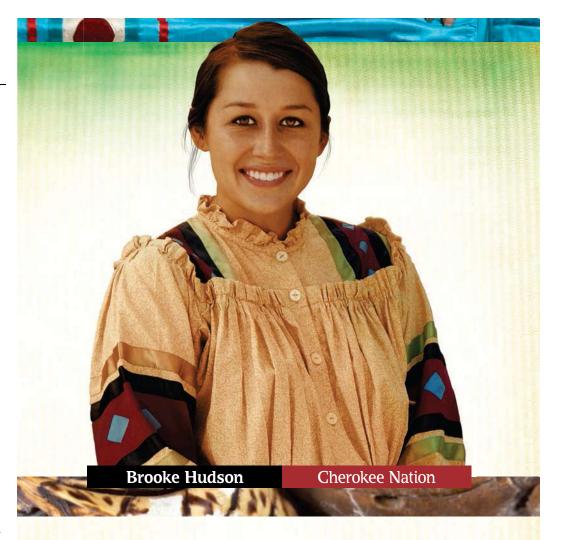

The first resolution, ONCA 11-12, would have removed the council from the Osage Nation's executive branch, similar to the Osage Nation Congress or the tribe's judiciary. However, the amendment, as written, does not state whether the council would be a fourth branch of government. It received 804 votes, or 54.55 percent.

The second resolution, ONCA 11-13, would have allowed the Minerals Council to enact its own election code and carry out its own elections. It received 815 votes, or 55.18

The third resolution, ONCA 11-14, would have given the eight-member council the sole authority to lease and develop the tribe's mineral estate. It received 831 votes, or 56.22 percent.

The fourth proposed amendment, ONCA 10-19, would have prohibited the Osage Nation Congress from passing any laws that would tax royalty income generated by the tribe's mineral estate. It would have also banned any taxes on the production and transportation of minerals within the tribe's mineral estate.

The tribe owns the mineral rights for all of Osage County and receives income for all oil and natural gas found within the 1.47-million acre county.

Tribe of the Fort Yuma Indian Reservation complained Monday about renewable energy projects on federal land being fast-tracked by the administration without adequate review of potential effects on sacred sites.

Mandatory consultation meetings have not resulted in any protections and the tribe feels it is being "stonewalled" by high-level federal officials, said John Bathke, the tribe's historic preservation officer.

"These projects, they're going on with complete disregard to Indians. It's like we don't have any say." Bathke said, explaining that siting of the projects is more about spirituality than land planning for many tribes.

"These renewable energy projects are part of a re-election campaign and we don't want to see this administration get re-elected at the expense of sacred sites, at the expense of native culture."

As part of gauging Indian Country's concerns with current protections of sacred sites, the agency has asked tribes to comment on whether it should attempt to define the term "sacred site."

Santa Ana Pueblo Gov. Ernest Lujan said that would be near impossible, especially considering future legal ramifications that could come from adopting a narrow definition.

"We're not only looking at a hillside or rock feature," he said. "We're looking at water, we're looking at land, we're looking at plants."

Dion Killsback, counselor to the assistant secretary of Indian Affairs, acknowledged that developing a policy for addressing sacred sites is made even more difficult giventhesecrecysurrounding many native religious and cultural practices.

Killsback said the goal is to find a way to "bridge the gap" by including tribal leaders at the outset of projects so some kind of balance can be worked out that respects tribal beliefs but allows for projects to move forward.

Meetings on sacred sites are also planned later this month in Montana, Minnesota and Connecticut.

Chickasaw flute presented to Shaolin Temple

neat connection."

CHICKASAW NATION Media Relations Office

ADA, Okla. – Chickasaws Jack and Wendell Pettigrew, making flutes was as natural a part of growing up as making their own fishing poles.

"When you'd go fishing, you didn't go out and buy a fancy fishing pole. You got a cane pole and put a line on it and Buddhism.

"There are Kung Fu tourists who go there," said Butler. "But to a lot of people this Abbott is like the Pope, because this temple is the birthplace of that style of Buddhism."

Butler said that as a student of Kung Fu, he recognized similarities between Chen Buddhism practiced by Shaolin monks and the Native American culture he is familiar

As it happens, his idea of presenting a Chickasaw flute as a gift opened the door to the monastery. "It was just kind of a spur of the moment thought before I left - maybe I should take them a gift kind of thing," said Butler. "It turns out if I hadn't come up with that idea, if I hadn't thought about it, I never would have even been able to talk to the Shaolin."

Knowing he wanted a very special flute for the presentation, he went to his friends Jack and Wendell Pettigrew.

"I was blown away by the flutes he showed me," said Butler. "But there was no way I could afford anything like that. So I purchased a small one."

Thinking he would have to make do with the smaller flute, Butler was about to drive away when Jack Pettigrew stopped him to offer a larger flute as a gift.

"I felt that giving (the Abbott) a traditional flute would be more appropriate," said Jack. "So we thought it would be nice to just present him with a flute with a Chickasaw design."

Design elements included a wolf, paw prints, the southeastern symbol representing water, bead work made of porcupine quills and an eagle. Wendell said that some of the design elements came from the mounds in the Chickasaw homelands.

"This flute that he gave me was museum quality," said Butler. "It just blew me away. It was absolutely beautiful."

While Butler was pleased he had a fine gift to present to the temple, there was some doubt he would ever get to make the presentation. When he first made the request to present a gift to the temple, his tour guide was very skeptical about his chances of meeting with one of the monks.

"She called back after she got the message and said that she didn't think that would be possible," he said. "She had been doing the tours for 12 years and she had never talked to the Shaolin directly.

"She said 'they are really busy and don't concern themselves with tourists. The students are the ones who do the Kung-Fu display. You probably won't even see a real Shaolin."

While Butler disappointed, he persisted.

"Then I told her it was a Native American gift from the Chickasaw Nation and I had made a promise to put it into the hands of a Shaolin monk and I wanted to make sure it got to the temple," he said. "I want to present it to the temple. It doesn't have to be the Abbott, but I would like it to be the Abbott.

"She said 'I have a number for the Abbott's secretary, I can call and see what happens."

Within an hour, the tour guide called back to say that the Abbott was very excited about the gift. While the Abbott was out of the country, he asked if Butler could delay his departure so the Abbott could receive the gift personally.

When Butler told her that was not possible, the Abbott appointed one of the monks to receive the gift. That monk brought a gift of prayer beads for Butler in exchange.

"I had a letter I had written out about the flute," he said. "My wife had translated it into Chinese. I printed it in both English and Chinese and gave it to them. The interpreter was telling them a little about the flute.

"The monk said it was a great honor for the temple to receive the gift. He said they felt a connection with the Native Americans. They believe the Native Americans and the Chinese share common ancestors."

When they went outside the temple to exchange gifts, Butler received an impromptu Kung Fu demonstration of

"The monk was going to put the beads in my hands and a tourist kind of pushed in between us and was going to try to snatch the beads, because he thought it was one of the vendors dressed like a monk," Butler said. "I learned one thing – never try to snatch anything from a Shaolin

"There was this blur - he spun the guy around and headed him down the stairs and the bracelet was on my hand before I knew what happened," he said with a chuckle.

When Butler returned, he presented the prayer beads to Jack and Wendell Pettigrew, who said that it gave them a sense of satisfaction to know that their work is in a place of prominence in the temple in China.

"I've always had this feeling that you've got to make your mark on this life somewhere," said Jack. "That's one of the reasons we do this art work. You want to leave your mark on life somewhere."

pueblo figures with basic bobblehead technology. His first piece was a traditional Cochiti drummer. He's also made traditional female singers.

His repertoire includes a bobblehead "rainman" and a bobblehead "pumpkin," each painted intraditional symbols incorporating jewelry, headbands, moccasins and sometimes drums. He was recently awarded a Rollin and Mary Ella King Fellowship at the School for Advanced Research. He wants to create a Catholic priest bobblehead.

a Catholic priest bobblehead. Collectors can't resist playing with them.

"They'll display them in their homes, but they like to play around with them a lot," Loretto said.

At the Wheelwright, a row of his moving clay figures lines the back of a display table. They range from the ubertraditional (pueblo singers) to figures with a decidedly contemporary bent. There's "Batman," complete with the "Dark Knight" logo splashed across his chest.

"I try to keep up with the times," he said.

A "Music Man" incorporates a traditional pueblo belt, but a galaxy of stars, treble clefs and quarter notes spangle his chest. A tribal tattoo embellishes his right arm.

The piece could be semi-autobiographical. Between building, painting and firing, he plays the guitar – specifically Dylan, Hendrix and U2.

The more traditional figures incorporate Mimbres designs and traditional pueblo clothing. A corn mother figure comes with a tiny ear of corn and a grinding stone. A kneeling female in prayer wears a gold medallion and comes with a tiny blanketed baby to be placed at her feet or cradled in her arms.

"I was thinking about how much the Catholic Church has impacted pueblo society," he said. "They kneel down and pray. It's that spiritual connection between that person and their God."

And canteens are a new item he started making about two months ago as a break between bobbleheads. He decorates them with Mimbres designs or a more contemporary face: Mickey Mouse. Corn husks sprout from the spout, while multicolored parrot feathers dangle from a braided leather strap.

He gathers the red clay from a spot off Interstate 25 and La Bajada. The paints are a mixture of traditional and commercial pigments to ensure that they adhere properly. He polishes each piece thoroughly with a stone before firing to rid it of all cracks.

"In the spring of this year, I had three pieces bust on me," he said. "Sometimes, it's moisture. Sometimes it's the clay itself. There's not too much (you can) control. It's a lot of faith. It humbles you."

He fires his pieces with pinon and cedar, using both a kiln and the traditional outdoor pueblo firing.

"They don't come to life until I do the outdoor firing," he explained. "The fire element touches life into it. When you just have a kiln fire, it's too commercial. There's no zest. It's the soot that imbues itself into the piece."

Before turning to clay, Loretto worked in construction and made jewelry. But silver and turquoise can be pricey.

He started making pinch pots as a cash-strapped teen after walking past the artists under the Palace of the Governors portal.

"It clicked to me that these people weren't paying for their material because it was free," he said. As he slowly grew from pinch pots to the Native coil method, he consulted with his cousin, famed Cochiti potter Diego Romero. Soon he was creating bowls.

"I tried a couple of storytellers, but it never really stuck with me," he added.

Then Ralph Lauren hired Loretto to make a line of concha belts. Oprah Winfrey bought one. But Loretto soon tired of the factory-like atmosphere of the production line. He made from 500 to 700 a month.

"It was just cutting, cutting metal and soldering," he said. "I went back into construction."

He doesn't mind teaching other potters his methods; he doesn't care if anyone copies him.

He'll gladly take commissions. So far, no one has asked for DiMaggio.

"I'm not selfish," he said.

"I don't put too many boundaries on art." Loretto's bobbleheads sell for $900-$1,500. The canteens are $300.

Loretto studied at the Southwestern Indian Polytechnic Institute and the Institute of American Indian Arts. When he was making iewelry, he worked with noted designers like Bagley & Hotchkiss and Ralph Lauren. His work has been featured at the Wheelwright, at IAIA, the Tower Gallery in Pojoaque, the Hui'noeau Visual Arts Center in Hawaii and at the Vermont Studio Center. He made his Indian Market debut in 2011.

"I lost so many friends, one after another. I spent my junior year going to funerals," said Whitney Balderrama, 19. "They even had a blessing at our school in case an evil spirit was going through it."

The tribal government declared a state of emergency. What would make all these kids take their lives in such a short time? Most of them came from caring families. Investigators found they hadn't been drinking or using drugs. There was no suicide pact.

Native leaders called in mental health expert Greg Powers, who once ran the reservation's hospital and had since retired to Gulfport in Pinellas County. He helped the Apache apply for a federal grant to receive intensive counseling and suicide prevention services.

The $6 million, six-year grant includes funds for an equine therapy program, teacher training and travel. It paid for the trip to the Orlando conference, where the kids would present videos about reservation life. And it enabled the Apache to bring along Maria Yellow Horse Braveheart, an associate professor at the University of New Mexico.

She believes the suicides stem, in part, from something she calls historical trauma.

"Generations of genocide, colonization, imprisonment, all of that trauma trickles down and leads to other issues," said Braveheart, who has studied and written about the issue for more than 20 years.

When the government systematically attacks a culture – when it uproots people, murders or jails them and steals their land – the disruption ripples through generations. Examples include Holocaust survivors, Japanese-Americans who were held in internment camps – and American Indians, Braveheart said.

"It's empowering for people to know what happened in the past," she said. "If they can understand where their issues are coming from, they have less self-blame and are less likely to succumb to substance abuse, anger and self-destruction."

Ofcourse, American Indians battle other, current issues: isolation, unemployment, poverty. Some of the Apache don't own cars, so they seldom leave the reservation. Many struggle to find even minimum-wage jobs. More than 70 percent qualify for Medicaid – and only 5 percent graduate from high school.

What's left of their culture is fading fast: These teenagers don't know their native language or how to ride a horse. But through computers and cable TV, they know all about hip-hop and hot rods, baggy jeans and bling, things they want to be a part of. But nothing that is a part of them.

"All of those factors, combined with how these kids are affected by their history, can lead to deep depression and despair," said Powers.

Some of the young Apache had heard of their ancestor Geronimo, how he was hated and imprisoned, his family hauled away. But none knew about the boxcars and boarding school. Or that towering shell fort in Florida.

After two hours on the bus, the teenagers tumbled out onto a narrow sidewalk in St. Augustine and found themselves surrounded by T-shirt shops.

"Where are we?" asked Tralin, the boy in the cowboy hat. "Where are we going?"

Counselors led the kids across the road to a winding path that climbed above the shore. In front of them loomed a 17th century fort with four diamond-shaped bastions jutting into the bay.

Tralin looked down at foamy waves lapping the sand. "Look at all that water!" he cried. "Is that the beach?"

A park ranger approached the 25 Apache and welcomed them to Castillo de San Marcos. "I know this will be controversial for some Native Americans, especially those of you who had ancestors here," said the ranger, Jill Jaworski.

"But I want you all to feel free to wander through the rooms. And know that we're installing new exhibits soon, ones that include your perspective. We're even going to enclose that Apache fire spirit in glass."

The teenagers didn't seem to hear. They were too busy taking pictures of the beach below. The elders looked at each other. What was an Apache fire spirit?

The ranger led them through a gate, past a gift shop, into the grassy center of the fort. "Is there a place they can change?" asked elder Bonna Dell Ortega, 68. She wanted the teenagers to wear their native dress so they would feel more connected to the history they were about to hear.

So the young Apache split off into the bathrooms, where the boys took off their backward baseball caps and pulled on long-sleeved shirts rimmed with ribbons. The girls pulled floor-length satin skirts over their jeans. Trinity Enjady, 14, forgot her moccasins; her Chuck Taylor high-tops flapped beneath her ceremonial dress.

"This way," said a counselor. "The elders are waiting."

In a corner of the fort, next to the powder magazine, an arched entry opened into a dark, vaulted room. There was no sign outside; the National Park Service map doesn't name this place. When someone asked the ranger, she said, "We just call it the Indian room."

The teenagers filed inside silently, staring at the rough walls made of coquina shells, peering through the metal bars striping the windows. It was hot in there, especially in their long sleeves and skirts.

"Please join hands," said Ortega. "Our people who came here always prayed to their creator, so we're going to open with our Apache prayer."

In 1886 U.S. troops rounded up the Apache and removed them from their native land in New Mexico.

"Our people were the last ones. Geronimo was their leader," Ortega said. He eluded capture for years, moving his people among the mountains. But the Army kept sending more soldiers and killing more Apache. "Finally," Ortega said, "he thought it would be best if he gave up. He wasn't captured. He surrendered, so his people could survive."

Troops forced 506 Apache into boxcars, mostly women and children. "Packed them in like cattle," said Ortega, whose great-grandfather was on the train. "They didn't know where they were going. And whenever they stopped, they were looked at as animals in a cage."

The train took them all the way to Florida, so they wouldn't be tempted to run home. Geronimo and 14 of his men were imprisoned at Fort Pickens in Pensacola. The rest "were brought here, to this fort, and kept in this very room," said Ortega. "Think of how hot this is; they had no airconditioning or bathrooms. Can you imagine living here? We are all descendants of people who suffered here."

One of the counselors held her hands to her face. The other elder wiped her eyes. But the teenagers had moved to the edge of the stuffy room and were standing in the doorway. Trinity was leaning against the wall, looking bored. Andrew Tsosie, 14, was texting.

"We are a strong people. We endured so much. Be proud of your past, and who you are," Ortega said. "Know where you came from and what others sacrificed for you."

The young Apache didn't seem to be listening when the elder talked about how, finally, guards let the prisoners move to the fort's top wall and erect makeshift teepees overlooking the water. They seemed unmoved when she explained that their ancestors built fires to try to make the Army rations taste more familiar.

"After two years, they put our people back on a train to take them to a fort out West," Ortega said. "But some of them didn't make it; 24 died here, of tuberculosis."

She began to talk about the children, and the teenagers looked up from the doorway. Andrew put down his phone.

"Guards ripped the children from their parents and sent them on another train, to Pennsylvania, to the Carlisle school for Indians, where they had to learn how to live in the white man's world."

The other elder, Dorene Fernando, 67, stood up and forced a slight smile. "But their prayers and their faith helped them, and if they hadn't held on, we wouldn't be here today," she said. "I tell you, their spirits are still here, making us stronger."

making us stronger."

When the teens ran to change out of their ceremonial outfits, one of the counselors stayed behind in the arched room. Clay Geronimo, 24, left the reservation to go to college, then returned to work in the new equine therapy program.

He had noticed something on the side wall. He leaned in and saw that someone had carved a face of a man wearing a pointed hat. "A crown dancer," gasped

"A crown dancer," gasped Geronimo, great-great-grandson of the leader. The outline was chiseled deep into the wall. The ranger had called the figure a fire spirit, but Geronimo knew it symbolized strength. It must have been a blessing, encouraging the Apache inmates to hold on.

"That took a long time," said Geronimo. He reached out and placed his right palm on the rough wall, beside the message from his ancestors, and whispered, "Thank you."

In the front of the charter bus, the two tribal elders were dozing.

The teenagers in the back were quiet. No one was taking pictures. "That made me sad," said Joe Little-Youngman, 15. "I kept thinking, what if my dad had been there? But it was also kind of exciting, I mean, that they didn't die there."

Trinity said she had never heard that part of her heritage. "It sounded like the Holocaust," she said. "I didn't know that happened to our people, too."

When the bus stopped outside a seafood restaurant, across the street from the Atlantic, all of the adults headed inside. But the teenagers lingered, looking longingly at the waves. "That's the beach, isn't it?" Tralin asked. "I want to go to the beach."

Geronimo told the other counselors he wasn't hungry, that he would take the teens to see the water.

So there on the shore near where their ancestors had suffered, on the sand those prisoners never got to tread, the young Apache kicked off their Converse, rolled up their Wranglers and, laughing, waded into the waves.

Judge throws out lawsuit over Fighting Sioux name

■ Supporters of the nickname are pressing for another proposed constitutional amendment that would require UND's sports teams to be known as the Fighting Sioux.

DAVE KOLPACK Associated Press

FARGO, N.D. (AP) - A federal judge has relegated the political fight over the University of North Dakota's Fighting Sioux to the history books, but supporters of the retired moniker say they won't back down.

U.S. District Judge Ralph Erickson, in a judgment posted last earlier this month, threw out a lawsuit by six American Indian students at UND, saying the overwhelming statewide vote in June against the nickname and the state Board of Higher Education's clear intent to retire the logo renders many points in the lawsuit meaningless.

"While some last gasps of further political action are still echoing across the state, it appears that as a political issue, the 'Fighting Sioux' nickname and logo dispute has been resolved and the losing position consigned to the dust heap of history," the judge said.

Supporters of the nickname are pressing for another constitutional amendment that would requireUND's sports teams to be known as the Fighting Sioux. Those gathering petitions for the second initiated measure said Tuesday they would not submitting signatures by midnight Wednesday, which is the deadline for the November ballot.

But they vow to press on and say they aren't swayed by Erickson's assessment.

"As a judge, it is his prerogative to issue his personal opinions from the bench," said Sean Johnson, spokesman for two groups in favor of the nickname. "Since this court case did not involve us, we are not bound to that opinion, however."

They have until Dec. 12 to turn in 27,000 signatures to Secretary of State Al Jaeger in order to make the next ballot in June 2014.

Johnson said the Spirit Lake Committee for Understanding and Respect and the Fighting Sioux Ballot Measures Committee did not want the nickname issue to be lumped in with other ballot measures set for November that "were not apparent when we first started our efforts."

Tim O'Keefe, head of the UND Alumni Association and Foundation, which campaigned against the first measure, said that plans for another referendum "are not only ill-advised, they become malicious attempts to damage UND, its students, studentathletes and reputation."

UND students Amber Annis, Lisa Casarez, William Crawford, Sierra Davis, Robert Rainbow, Margaret Scott, Franklin Sage and Janie Schroeder filed their lawsuit in August 2011. They alleged the nickname has had "a profoundly negative impact" on their self-image and psychological health, and has deprived them "of an equal educational experience and environment."

The lead attorney for the students, Carla Fredericks, a New York attorney and enrolled member of the Three Affiliated Tribes in North Dakota, did not return a phone message left last week by The Associated Press.

Erickson said the lawsuit does not prove direct discrimination by the state or "deliberate indifference" to rights violations.

The judge earlier this year dismissed a separate lawsuit against the NCAA by nickname supporters at the Spirit Lake and Standing Rock Sioux tribes, who claimed they were not included in the discussions when the NCAA and the state negotiated a settlement agreement to retire the logo. That case is now before the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

UND was one of the last colleges standing in the nickname debate that started in 2005 when the NCAA listed 19 schools with American Indian nicknames, logos and mascots it deemed to be "hostile and abusive." UND sued the NCAA, which led to the settlement.

A law requiring the school to keep the moniker was repealed eight months after it took effect last year, after the NCAA refused to budge on sanctions. Nickname supporters gained enough signatures to put the issue on the June ballot, where more than two-thirds of voters chose to dump the moniker.

Duaine Espegard, president of the state Board of Higher Education and a resident of Grand Forks, where UND is located, had little reaction to the latest action on the nickname.

"The people of North Dakota have spoken and the university is moving forward," Espegard said.

Pawnee leadership still undecided on settlement money

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

PAWNEE, Okla. — A twicepostponed joint council meeting left many Pawnee Nation citizens still wondering Saturday how their tribe is going to spend a multi-million dollar federal payout.

Earlier this year, the tribe received a $4.4 million settlement payment as part of Nez Perce v. Salazar, a 2006 lawsuit against the federal government. Since the Pawnee Nation received its share, some tribal citizens have been speculating about how the money would be spent, prompting Saturday's joint meeting between the tribe's business council and Nasharo Council, or Chiefs' Council.

Originally scheduled for June the money and if folks want to give 16, then delayed until Aug. 18 and postponed again, more than 30 tribal citizens attended the Aug. 25 meeting to offer their suggestions on how to spend the money.

Several attendees expressed their support for using at least a portion of the settlement funds for a per capita

"Let each of us have a portion of it back to the tribe, then fine," David Wichita said. "They can give it to burial aid, the education program or another program that they think needs help if they don't want to keep

"Our people shouldn't have to beg for this money," Pawnee elder Bea Realrider said. "It's a small amount

TULSA, Okla. - It will not make you into a lawyer, but a new degree program through the University of Tulsa's College of Law could help individuals shape native determination legal issues for years to come.

The college began offering the online Master of Jurisprudence in Indian Law degree program in the fall of 2011. Beginning with 10 students, the program enrolled 25 new students for the fall 2012 semester and is taking applications for next spring.

Shonday Harmon, program director for the MJIL program, said it is the first master's graduate level program of its kind in Indian law.

"The inception of the program came about from area tribes contacting the Native American law center asking for professional development courses," Harmon, Muscogee-Creek, said. "There was a need for non attorneys to understand the legalese of Indian law."

The program requires the completion of 30 hours of graduate course work in subjects ranging from civil and criminal jurisdiction on Indian land to gaming law, property rights and the child welfare act. As tribes throughout the country

Tiger signs tobacco compact with Okla.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

OKMULGEE, Okla. — For the first time in seven years, the Muscogee (Creek) Nation has a tobacco compact with the state of Oklahoma.

"It isn't everything we wanted, but this allows our smoke shops to be competitive again," Principal Chief George Tiger said during an emergency meeting of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation National Council Aug. 23. "This gives our local communities the opportunity to make money."

The Oklahoma tax on cigarettes is $10.30 on a 10-pack carton, or $1.03 per pack. Under this compact, Oklahoma will receive 50 percent of that tax rate from retail sales by the Creek Nation. Prior to Friday's compact, the Muscogee (Creek) Nation's smoke shops were remitting the full $1.03 tax per pack sold to non-tribal members.

Tobacco purchases made by tribal members were tax-exempt; a provision not included in the new compact.

Additionally, state-licensed wholesalers will collect a "tribal tax" through Aug. 30, 2017, on purchases by smoke shops owned by or licensed through the Muscogee (Creek) Nation. Each carton with 10 packs of 20 cigarettes will be taxed $1.50, or $.15 per pack. A carton of 10 packs with 25 cigarettes each will be taxed $1.88, or $.18 per pack. All other products, such as smokeless tobacco, will be subject to a 14.6 percent sales tax.

Also, under the terms of the compact, as part of a settlement of a pending lawsuit in Tulsa County

Auction cancelled for SD land considered sacred

KRISTI EATON Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) - The planned auction of nearly 2,000 acres of land in South Dakota's picturesque Black Hills that is considered sacred by American Indian tribes has been cancelled, though it wasn't immediately clear why.

Brock Auction Company planned to auction five tracts of land owned by local residents Leonard and Margaret Reynolds Aug. 25. But a message on the auction house's website Aug. 23 said it has been cancelled at the land owners' direction.

The auction house and Margaret Reynolds declined comment, and tribal officials were left wondering what had happened.

"There are a lot of things we don't know at this point," Rosebud Sioux Tribe spokesman Alfred Walking Bull said. "If there was a change of heart, we're definitely thankful for that. We're hoping for the best. We can take a breath right now."

Tribes of the Great Sioux Nation consider the site key to their creation story and are trying to purchase the land, which they call Pe' Sla, because they fear new owners would develop it. The property, which spans about 1,942 acres of pristine prairie grass, is the only sacred site on private land currently outside Sioux control.

Cherokee Nation crowns 2012-2013 Jr. Miss Cherokee

Cherokee Nation News Release

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. - Julie Thornton of Muskogee reigned supreme at Cherokee Nation's latest ambassador competition taking home the 2012-2013 Jr. Miss Cherokee title. For the next year Thornton will act as a goodwill ambassador for the tribe promoting the government, language, history and traditions of the Cherokee people.

Thornton, 17, is the daughter of Bryant and Shelly Thornton. She is a senior at Hilldale High School in Muskogee. Thornton won over the judges with her knowledge of Cherokee language and history and impressed the audience with a cultural presentation over traditional Cherokee basketry. She will assume the duties held by the 2011-2012 Jr. Miss Cherokee, Christy Kingfisher.

During her reign as Jr. Miss Cherokee, Thornton said she is going to focus on helping more people achieve higher education.

"Higher education is what will create a better foundation for [Cherokees] in the future,"

Thornton said during her platform presentation. "Cherokee Nation has boundless opportunities for higher education and as Jr. Miss I will do my best to inform everyone, young and old, of the vast opportunities available to them as Native Americans."

Cierra Fields, 13, of Fort Gibson was named first runner-up. Fields is an eighth-grade student at Fort Gibson Middle School and the daughter of Richard and Terri Fields. Fields also received the cultural presentation award and the traditional dress award.

Second runner-up went to Megan Baker, 15, of Locust Grove. Baker is a sophomore at Locust Grove High School and the daughter of Jeremy and Gina Baker. Baker won the essay and academic awards as well.

Also participating in the competition were contestants Deonna Toney, 15, of Sallisaw and Sage Butler, 15, of Jay. Butler was awarded Miss Congeniality. The Jr. Miss Cherokee Ambassador competition was held in conjunction with the 60th Cherokee National Holiday.

Fort Sill Apache open first hotel among area tribes

S.E. RUCKMAN

Native Times Special Contributor

LAWTON, Okla. - Fort Sill Apache fire dancers ushered in the opening events last week for the tribe's new $27 million hotel addition, calling forth both protection and prosperity for the venture.

The hotel is the first one among the eight local tribes gaming ventures and officials hope that it will set a new bar on area Indian gaming. Tribal chairman, Jeff Haozous, said expectations for the hotel will be fulfilled.

"This is a long-term investment, so it goes past short-term fluctuations in the economy," he said. "We made these decisions regardless of the overall economic climate."

Guests turned out for the new hotel's opening on Aug. 23 and more came back for an official grand opening and VIP party on Aug. 25 where the tribe introduced local and state officials along with tribal members to the new property. Opening ceremonies included a red carpet, showgirls and limousines. The event also featured the giveaway of a new car.

With 132 rooms, the newly named Apache Casino Hotel (formerly Fort Sill Apache Casino) has a restaurant, pool, bar and conference space on the 10-acre site. It also features a coffee bar, spa and gym in the 100,000-sq. ft facility, all visible on a new $450,000 digital sign in front of the hotel. The hotel is projected to increase the Apaches' casino gross revenue by up to 20 percent, officials said.

While the hotel is expected to exceed expectations, tribal officials are already considering improvements to the site.

With 132 rooms, the newly named Apache Casino Hotel (formerly Fort Sill Apache Casino) has a restaurant, pool, bar and conference space on the 10-acre site.

The tribe rescaled a casino snack bar on its gaming-eligible property to put in more machines.

The hotel, sponsored by tribal bonds through Obama's 2010 economic stimulus act, was a combination of several factors besides financial backing, said tribal vice chairman, Lori Gooday Ware. Ware said their formula included a longtime trusted tribal attorney, Robert Prince, and a business committee that worked well together.

"Sure we argued it out as we went along, we did things that we didn't necessarily want to do," she said. "But we stuck to it anyways because we wanted a new hotel."

The multi-million dollar facility has evolved rapidly since it opened electronic gaming machines in 1999. It recently opened under a sprung structure that is the core of its current gaming operation.

The hotel is expected to draw both regular customers and new clients from Lawton and Texas, officials said. Much of the tribe's hotel progress has come by partnering with local civic groups, working closely with Lawton officials and keeping an eye to the end result, Haozous said.

"They knew about our internal tribal stability, that helped a lot," Haozous said. "I think it also helped to create Lawton city council, Jay Burk, said the hotel would boost tourism for Lawton as a stand-alone venture.

"It proves we (Lawton) have a diversity of people who can boost our economy," he said. "That part of this is on school land, it will mean sales taxes on the property that will help

The hotel sits on land excluded from trust status, which allows local and state sales to be levied.

In the meantime, the tribe continues work on re-opening a gaming site in Deming, New Mexico. The tribe opened a facility in 2009 that was closed by state authorities in 2010. The tribe maintains the New Mexico land is eligible for gaming since it is in the tribe's original jurisdiction. It faced forced removal to the Fort Sill/Lawton area in the 1880s after Chiricahua Apaches were held captive by the federal government.

But the new hotel's opening has a special significance because upcoming centennial of their captive release approaches in 2013, tribal officials

"I think our ancestors will be proud of our new hotel," Ware said. "We've come through a lot and we didn't give up. I think (former chief and FSA elder) Mildred Cleghorn would be very proud of us."

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. – employment bill passed by the nation's largest federally recognized tribe appears to be more restrictive than its neighbors.

On Aug. 13, the Cherokee Nation Tribal Council passed legislation requiring five highranking positions - chief of staff, general counsel to the principal chief, director of communications, director of government relations and chief executive officer of Cherokee Nation Businesses - be held by Cherokee Nation citizens. Principal Chief Bill John Baker did not veto it, citing an attorney general's opinion that the legislation violates two articles of the tribe's constitution.

Federal law allows for tribes to give hiring preference to Native Americans. Although many other Oklahoma tribes give preference to tribal citizens and members of other tribes when filling vacant positions, the Cherokee Nation's restriction appears to be the exception rather than the rule.

"We practice Chickasaw and Native American preference for employment with spokeswoman Robyn Elliott said. "That policy works well for us. Gov. Anoatubby is eager to employ Chickasaws and has made it a priority. We have been very successful with that policy Judy Allen, executive director of public relations for the Choctaw Nation, said the Durant, Okla. - based tribe does not have a citizenship requirement, except for elected and certain appointed positions. The United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians, which shares a capitol city with the Cherokee Nation, gives preference to its own citizens when hiring, but a representative for the tribe said it does not have a formal citizenship requirement for any non-elected position, including members of the tribe's

John Garrett, a Cherokee Nation citizen who was appointed to his tribe's Supreme Court in June, served as a UKB Supreme Court justice from 2006 until his resignation last year.

Additionally, the tribe's attorney general, Ken Bellmard, is a citizen of the Kaw Nation.

The Muscogee (Creek) Nation, headquartered in Okmulgee, Okla., did not respond to interview requests. According to the annotated legal code available on the Muscogee (Creek) Nation judiciary's website, citizenship in the Muscogee (Creek) Nation is only listed as a prerequisite for Secretary of State. Justices and the attorney general must be members of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation Bar Association, but are not required to be tribal citizens.

OKC Indian ed program launches Ervhvh, a 'Little Sister Society'

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON

Native American Times

OKLAHOMA CITY — After several years of dreaming, hoping and planning, an Oklahoma school district's Indian education program is getting a support program off of the ground.

Oklahoma's largest school district, Oklahoma City Public Schools, serves more than 43,000 students, including more than 2,100 Native Americans representing almost 50 tribes. In an effort to better serve its female students, the district's Native American Student Services office launched a Little Sister Society pilot program during the 2011-2012 school year.

"We already had a similar program for our young men," NASS director Star Yellowfish said. "It's very hands-on and culturally-based. Several parents asked why we didn't have an equivalent in place for girls. Our girls have different issues and need cultural role models as Five Native students from across the school district actively participated in the program last year and were individually matched with Native career women from the Oklahoma City metro area. Participants were in contact at least once a week and the Native American Student Services office sponsored monthly activities, including basket weaving, serving dinner at a powwow, zumba and ice skating.

After receiving overwhelmingly positive feedback from parents and participants, the district is now expanding the program, hoping to match 20 Native women in grades 5-11 with big sisters.

"Last year, we were really looking for girls who needed that intervention," Yellowfish said. "One of the changes we're making this year is implementing an application process. We had girls come up to us last year who wanted to be involved but didn't necessarily have the problems that would have gotten them nominated by a teacher, a counselor or a family member for the pilot program."

In addition to adding an application process, the program has undergone a

"We were called the Little Sister Society last year, but we found out another program is using that name," program coordinator Yafke Marks said. "So our new name is from the Muscogee (Creek) language: Ervhvh Society."

Ervhvh is the Muscogee (Creek) word for "little sister." Big sisters will be called cvrahhv, the Muscogee (Creek)

Cholakocee Werito, a Muscogee (Creek)/Navajo graduate of Oklahoma City's Northwest Classen High School and Oklahoma State University, volunteered as a big sister last year at the urging of Marks, her cousin.

"I was looking for something to get involved in last year," Werito said. "I had a really good adviser in high school, but would have liked to have had access to something like this when I was in their

"My parents are not college graduates and having that exposure to professional and college-educated women would have been really nice and educated me better. I hope that when I talk college stuff with my little sister, that it will help her plan ahead and start looking for scholarships when it comes time."

Werito has already signed up as a volunteer for the 2012-2013 school year and requested that she keep the same little sister if at all possible.

In the meantime, Yellowfish, Marks and the NASS staff are still looking for volunteers and ideas to build the program up to better serve the district's Native American girls.

"This is still a brand new program," Yellowfish said. "It will take time to get our numbers up, but we're more concerned about the quality of the program. I want these girls to come away with something positive that will stick with them for a long time."

reservation is among the closest to the land, has allocated $1.3 million toward trying purchasing the property, though tribal officials fear the selling price could be between $6 million and $10 million.

Walking Bull said he wasn't aware of the cancelled auction until contacted by The Associated Press. Rosebud Sioux President Rodney Bordeaux also said he didn't have details, saying: "I don't know anything more than you do."

Organizers of a website that has collected more than $250,000 from 5,000 donors to help purchase the land said they also were unaware of why the auction was cancelled.

Sara Jumping Eagle, a member of the Oglala Sioux Tribe who started the site with her husband, Chase Iron Eyes of the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe, said they are trying to gather more information but are continuing to raise money since the property is still publicly listed.

Roughly 20 tribes make up the Great Sioux Nation, which was fragmented when American Indians were pushed to reservations. The tribes now span several states including Montana, Wyoming, the Dakotas and Minnesota, and Canada, and members hold ceremonies and rituals on the South Dakota land.

A United Nations fact finder had urged the federal government, and local and state officials in South Dakota to consult with American Indians ahead of the auction. U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs spokeswoman Nedra Darling said Thursday she also was unaware that the auction had been cancelled and declined comment.

The tribes believe the Sioux people were created from the Black Hills. According to part of their spiritual tradition, Pe' Sla is where the Morning Star fell to Earth, killing seven beings that killed seven women. The Morning Star placed the souls of the women into the night sky as "The Seven Sisters," also known as the Pleiades constellation.

COMPACT

(Okla.)DistrictCourtbetween the state of Oklahoma and more than a dozen Muscogee (Creek) smoke shop owners and operators, the tribe must pay the state $11.5 million dollars, including $1.5 million upon the document's signing and annual $2 million installments over the next five

While the Muscogee (Creek) Nation is making payments, the state has agreed to place a stay on its claims in the lawsuit. Once the settlement is paid in full, the state will dismiss most of its claims in the lawsuit, except for any individual criminal or tax liabilities under state law created by the new compact.

Filed in 2009 by thenattorney general Drew Edmondson, the lawsuit alleges that 17 Muscogee (Creek) smoke shop owners and licensees conspired to break state and federal laws concerning cigarette sales in Oklahoma by creating and using various methods of obtaining low-tax cigarettes and cigarettes without tax stamps in order to better compete in the market, including purchasing more than 5.3 million packs of unstamped cigarettes between February 2007 and May 2008 from a wholesaler not licensed by the Oklahoma Tax Commission.

"The state of Oklahoma values the financial, economic and cultural contributions of its Indian tribes," Gov. Mary Fallin said. "This compact between the Muscogee (Creek) Nation and the state of Oklahoma resolves past disputes and marks a new spirit of partnership between the state and the tribe."

Despite paying anywhere from two to 17 times more than other tribes in excise taxes, Muscogee (Creek) smoke shops sold 268.7 million cigarettes in 2011, second only to the Cherokee Nation among Oklahoma

The terms and per-pack tax rates for each tribe's compacts vary. A lower tax rate is available for tribal smoke shops within 20 miles of Oklahoma's borders with Arkansas, Kansas or Missouri, which have lower tobacco tax rates. That rate either $.06 or $.25 per pack - was not extended to the Muscogee (Creek) Nation due to geography.

We're landlocked," Tiger said. "Our compact does not have any provisions about our borders and I can't speak to the terms of our neighbors' compacts. I can only talk about this compact."

The Muscogee (Creek) Nation is bordered by two tribes - Cherokee Nation and Osage Nation - that have border rates for some of their tribally-owned and licensed smoke shops.

Last Thursday's vote came less than 48 hours before the council's regularly scheduled August meeting. National Council Speaker Alexander said the decision to call an emergency meeting rather than wait until Saturday was made in an effort to help speed business along.

"We have a pretty full agenda for Saturday," Alexander said. "We wanted to get this out of the way so we can start moving forward."

that won't necessarily go that far, but we shouldn't have to beg or tell our life stories to justify getting a few extra dollars. It's our money and we want it

Another elder, Lillie Cummings, submitted a petition with more than 220 signatures this spring to the tribe's government, requesting a per capita

"Why can't we get a 'yes' or 'no' vote today?" Cummings asked. "At this point, I don't know if the council wants to listen to us or not."

Other attendees suggested allocating at least part of the money into tribal programs, primarily common education and elder assistance. Other suggested investing it into business ventures that would generate revenue and create additional jobs for the community, such as a grocery store.

After more than four hours of discussion and public comments, the remained stationed at the entrance councils postponed a decision and announced a second joint meeting to discuss the matter after allowing additional time for out-of-state tribal members to voice their suggestions. The next meeting, scheduled for Sept. 8, will be held entirely in executive session, a decision many attendees derided.

"They don't want the people to know what's going on," Cynthia Rice said after the meeting. "They (the councils) should already have had something in place before the check hit the bank."

Despite comments and compliments about the turnout, several attendees were turned away early on.

As soon as the opening prayer ended, Pawnee Nation Business Council president Marshall Gover asked everyone to leave who was not an enrolled citizen of the Pawnee Nation.

"This is a tribal matter for tribal members only," Gover said. "This money came to the Pawnee Nation. If there is a per capita, it will be restricted to those who are enrolled here."

A Pawnee Nation police officer

Among those excluded from the meeting was June Hamilton, the director of Indian Education for Pawnee Public Schools. Half Pawnee by blood, she is an enrolled citizen of the Sac and Fox Nation.

"This isn't right," she said. "I've lived here all my life. I served on the tribe's housing and Head Start boards. Just because I'm enrolled in my father's tribe doesn't mean I'm not deeply concerned about what is going on. I love my community and my people.

"My mother was on the roll. My grandparents were on the roll. My kids and grandkids are enrolled and they're talking about plans for the future in there. I'd like to know how they're going to be impacted. Most of the kids I work with are Pawnee and I'd like to be in there to help speak for them as well."

The Pawnee Nation has about 3,500 enrolled citizens. It is the smallest of the 40 tribes that participated in Nez Perce v. Salazar and the only one based in Oklahoma.

assert Native sovereignty through economic, social and policy means, the intricacies of Indian law become Indian law is unique, said G. William Rice, co-director of the Native American Law Center at the TU College of Law, because of the relationship between tribes and the federal government and because of the trust status the U.S. has assumed regarding Indian people.

If you're enrolled in a federallyrecognized Native American tribe, are employed by one, live on tribal property or do business with a Native-owned or affiliated business, Indian law affects you.

"A classic example is a social worker, police officer or other entities doing business with tribes. If they don't understand the legalities unique to tribes, they can make significant mistakes and open themselves up to liability," Rice said. "... People need to know the legal facts in which they are operating."

Headlines of the court custody battle for a Cherokee child, a Broken Arrow neighborhood's stance against a proposed Indian gaming facility and tribes fighting for access to sacred sites all attest to the complexity and reach of such laws.

"It seems to me that it's a program answering a need, really," Rice said. "I don't know how many times I've seen trials where the staff and officers needed information and just didn't have access to it."

TU's law school offers a Juris Doctorate degree program with more than 300 students enrolled. Candidates can study for a formal Indian law certificate. The master of jurisprudence in Indian law, however, is a study of law theory. Rice and his colleagues at the Native American Law Center developed the curriculum to make it accessible to people from many professional fields who need to know the workings of Indian law. For that reason, the online program has attracted a broad spectrum of students.

Harmon said there is a total of 44 students enrolled in the program. Among them, 24 tribes from 15 states are represented as well as one from Canada. Many are Native, but others are not. Some work for tribes, others are business owners hoping to work with a tribe. Some are grant writers for organizations, some hold political office or work for tribes while others are practicing attorneys expanding their knowledge of Indian law.

The interactive online platform, which allows students to watch the lectures either live or recorded, makes it possible for many to stay where they live and continue working fulltime. Faculty are also available for advisement. For Cynthia Mae Tiger of Bixby, the online classes are making it possible for her to work toward a degree that will help her improve her small business, Tiger 2 Tiger, LLC, while she works and takes care of her family. Tiger, a single mother, is a grant writer/reviewer and independent project management consultant. She is particularly interested in Indian law focused on economic development, land and property rights and natural resources.

Tiger, Muscogee-Creek/Absentee Shawnee/Euchee, said the knowledge she is learning in her classes and reading is valuable to her success.

"This course helps (me) to understand the obstacles of owning a business in Indian country," she said.

For students enrolled on a parttime basis, the course is designed to be completed in about five to six

Because the program is so new (its first students are expected to graduate in the spring) the faculty is careful to make too many adjustments to the curriculum at this time, but they do foresee improvements to the technology making the online platform more interactive for instructors and students.

Harmon said the school looks to enroll more students in the spring 2013 semester as word spreads about the MJIL degree program.

"Our hope is that it will be useful to Indian self-determination and that it will be a benefit for people on a day-to-day basis," he said.

Just don't tell 'em about the pajamas

LISA SNELL

The Native American Business Enterprise Center recognized the Native Times with an award last week. It was a really nice affair. They fed us all a good dinner and I met some great people. I was even at the same table as Dana Lance, who until then I'd only known via email and news from the Chickasaw Nation.

The evening was going really well until I realized that I'd be expected to say a few words up on the stage. Yes. Up there. In front of everyone.

My first job out of high school was a radio announcer and I worked as an announcer for several years. You'd think public speaking would be easy. Well, it is. If I can't see who's listening and they can't see me talking. I felt like Forrest Gump standing in line to meet the President after getting shot in the buttocks.

I reached over and squeezed my husband's knee. "What do I say?" I asked.

"Calm down. Just say what's important and don't tell 'em you spend half the day in your pajamas," he said.

Well, THAT cat is out of the bag, now, isn't it? And now I need to remember to discuss with our 5-year-old that she and I got dressed BEFORE Daddy got home from work so Daddy WOULDN'T KNOW we spent the day in our

I reached for my glass of wine and changed my mind. I pictured the episode of The Big Bang Theory where Sheldon drinks wine to calm his nerves before accepting an award. His drunken acceptance speech and pantless antics went viral on YouTube.

Then I remembered producing for John Erling of KRMG radio back in the day. Before his shift he'd sip a cup of hot lemon water to clear his throat. I made do with coffee. I was last to go, so I had time to consider. What was important? The answer was 'who,' not what.

Saturday marks my four-year anniversary of owning the Native American Times. When I bought the paper, the economy was sinking and newspapers across the country were shutting their doors. I was oblivious to that at the time. Owning a newspaper was a nearly forgotten college dream that was coming true.

However, one thing, a very important thing I hadn't considered, was what I'd do with the paper once it printed. It had to be delivered and I was so worried about producing the paper I hadn't thought of that little technicality.

I didn't have the time to tell the entire story to the dinner crowd last week, so I'd like to tell it now. There's a group of people out there I owe a lot to and I want them to know it.

I had a fax copy of all the distribution points written out in longhand by the former owners and the woman that delivered for them. None of them wanted to do it anymore. I knew I couldn't take care of my baby, deliver papers, edit, write, design, sell ads and manage the website, too. I needed help.

My parents stepped up. They loaded up the Toyota and away they went. It took three days and 1,500 miles. We didn't have street addresses so a lot of time was spent hunting around and asking "where is such and such." My mom kept a yellow legal pad that she filled with addresses and notes. After about three months, Dad declared he was tired. His butt was tired. It was time to quit. I put an ad in the paper and hired a distribution driver. Thanks to my parents, I was able to get on my feet and keep it going during the worst of times.

Since then, I've been blessed with great contributing writers, talented tribal media friends and several readers who submit some pretty good articles. But I wouldn't have a newspaper if I didn't have people putting it out there for everyone to read. Advertisers need circulation and I need advertisers to pay everyone that makes the newspaper happen

I started off doing two routes myself and hired some help for the rest. I've been blessed with some good people (and learned lessons from some not so good). People stepped up who cared about the job and doing it well. Goodwin Bassett from up in Red Rock was my first hire. He passed the job on to Randy Whitehorn who passed it on to Curtis Johnson. All good people who did a great job but had to move on. The days are long and the miles are hard on a car and harder on the tires.

Wes Mahan has been with me the longest. He's been through a couple of cars now and who knows how many tires he's driven bald. He and Steve Lacy put in 10-plus hour days. Wes heads south and west one day, north and east the next. Steve heads west and north up to Ponca City and then makes sure the Osage Nation and a chunk of the Cherokee Nation gets their papers. My sister, Brenda Slaughter, is the crazy one. I think every newspaper has at least one Crazy on staff. She only delivers one day, but she's determined that as many Choctaws as possible get the Native Times. She drives more than 750 miles and puts in 14 hours, driving from Westville to Tahlequah and back over to the Arkansas border. Then she heads south down to far southeastern Oklahoma to Idabel, Broken Bow and Hugo. The air went out on her car and still she runs her route, even if it's 115 degrees. (She says she keeps an ice chest full of water in the front seat and the windows down.) Kathy Robertson takes care of Anadarko and often chases down the errant UPS guy in her car to make sure she gets her papers delivered

In addition, I owe a big thanks to Mike Marris (Durant) and Dana Attocknie (Oklahoma City) who deliver the Times for free. Why? They love the newspaper.

Because of these people who care about their jobs and the newspaper, the Native American Times went from 5,000 copies per week in 2008 to being the third-largest circulated weekly in Oklahoma.

Now that's pretty important.

*It's also important to call before you drop by my office. I can't have you catching me in my

IHCRC holding 'teddy bear' clinic Sept. 8

Indian Health Care Resource Center News Release

TULSA, Okla. - Indian Health Care Resource Center of Tulsa, Inc. (IHCRC) will be hosting a pediatric health fair which will include a teddy bear clinic on Saturday, September 8th from 10am-12pm at 550 S. Peoria Avenue in Tulsa. A variety of health and safety information for parents will be available to all that attend. This event is free and open to the public.

Children are encouraged to bring their favorite teddy bear, stuffed animal or doll to the health fair. During the event, the child will serve as the "parent" of the teddy bear or other stuffed animal while accompanying them through the different service areas of the clinic which will include reception, waiting room, doctor's exam, and radiology. The goal of the teddy bear clinic is to provide a fun environment that will alleviate a child's fears of the medical setting and allow doctors, nurses, and technicians to perform various procedures on the toys, including X-rays, lab tests and checkups. At the same time, children get a better understanding of how a doctor's office work and learn about wellness and injury prevention.

They will also get great prizes as they go throughout the clinic. If a child does not have a favorite toy with them, we will provide 125 children with their very own teddy bear.

"The Teddy Bear Clinic is designed to be a similar healthcare experience that a child might have when they go for an annual checkup," says Carmelita Skeeter, IHCRC CEO. "Participation in the clinic will help kids become more familiar with a hospital setting and allow them to become more at ease when seeing a doctor."

In addition to the children being able to take their teddy bear through the clinic to learn about healthy living, they will also be able to enjoy Tulsa Firefighters with a fire truck from 10-12am, balloon twisters, face painting, games and activities. Attendees will also have the chance to win one of many great prizes including a new Wii.

Feds start training program to combat sex assault

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - Federal officials have started a training program to help the law enforcement community investigate and prosecute sexual assault cases on tribal land.

Representatives from nearly two dozen American Indian tribes turned out last week for the first training seminar at the National Advocacy Center in South Carolina.

Leslie Hagen is the U.S. Justice Department's Indian Country training coordinator. She says it's going to take federal and tribal commitment and a coordinated response to address the high rates of sexual violence in tribal communities.

Justice Department statistics show American Indians are 2.5 times more likely to be sexually assaulted compared to all other races. Also, one in three Indian women reports having been raped during her lifetime.

Some of the training is aimed at understanding federal statutes, initial crime scene investigation and forensic examinations.

Wind Horse Family Counseling Center ready to serve SE Okla.

BRET MOSS

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

IDABEL, Okla. - The Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma (CNO) officially opened the doors of the Wind Horse Family Counseling Center with a ribbon cutting ceremony on Tuesday, Aug. 21, 2012.

The center, located at 1303 Lynn Lane in Idabel, near the Idabel Children's Clinic, will provide drug and alcohol counseling, as well as mental health help in areas such as grief counseling, depression and anxiety.

Any CDIB cardholder will be able to receive help with any one of these disorders from qualified mental health professionals. Lisa Meredith, who heads operations at the center, has over 20 years of experience in the field of mental health. Her associate, M. Jane Wilson, has also had extensive experience in the field and both are ready to make an impact in the Idabel area.

As the ribbon was cut and doors opened on the facility, new possibilities to aid the people of McCurtain County were realized. We really want to expand our counseling opportunities and incorporate many types of counseling services, said Wilson as she explained her hopes for the impact of the center. "We are always looking to improve our services and expand," followed Meredith.

The center will be open to appointments, walk-ins, and emergency calls when needed. In cases of emergency, anyone seeking help will need to call the hospital, which will dispatch to the on-

Based on the assessed need of the area,

Meredith expects to see between 50 and 100 patients per week. A receptionist will aid Meredith and Wilson with the flow of patients. Plans to add a third member to the counseling team are in effect as well.

A facility such as this has been a goal of District 1 Tribal Councilman Thomas Williston for some time. During his 25-year law enforcement career in McCurtain County, Williston has seen much heartache associated with alcohol and substance abuse.

With the high rate of substance abuse in the area, many individuals feel the direct and indirect effects. Children, spouses, family and friends all suffer mentally, and sometimes physically, when someone they care for becomes involved in these types of activities.

Idabel's Assistant Chief of Police John Martin describes the mental state of substance abusers as a cycle. Once they get involved, it is hard to break that streak. "We are hoping this is an intervention that will get them out of that system," stated Martin.

It is the hope of all involved in this effort, that the resources and aid provided by the facility will give those who feel they are trapped by addictions or mental ailments, the power to pull themselves out of their rut and break the cycle.

"We want to be there to give a hand to people," said Assistant Chief Gary Batton as he gave his remarks before the ribbon

The Wind Horse Family Counseling Center is open Monday through Friday, 8 a.m. -4:30 p.m. If you would like to make an appointment of find out more about services provided, please call 580-286-7025.

The late Elouise Cobell began a class-action suit in the latter 1990s requesting an accounting of the mismanagement of funds by the US Department of the Interior.

WASHINGTON - After 16 years of litigation, the historic $3.4 billion Cobell settlement agreement has once more been delayed in litigation even as thousands of classaction members await their

On Aug. 20, the deadline to appeal a May ruling against her claims by a lower federal court, Sisseton Wahpeton

Oyate member Kimberly Craven filed for a writ of certiorari, or cert petition, with the United States Supreme Court as an objector to the Cobell settlement agreement.

Three others - Rosebud Sioux Tribe member Charles Colombe, Three Affiliated Tribes member Carol Eve Good Bear, and Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe member Mary Lee Johns, will also file as objectors as it stands. On Aug.

17, the high court granted the three an extension to appeal until Sept. 22. The requested delay will allow Colombe, Good Bear and Johns to review Craven's filing before filing their own joint motion with the Supreme Court.

The late Elouise Cobell began a class-action suit in the latter 1990s whereby and through litigation a historical accounting of the mismanagement of funds by the U.S. Department of the Interior was requested.

Craven's cert petition contends, "After more than fifteen years of litigation originally intended to achieve an adequate accounting for Indians holding Individual Indian Money accounts (trustland accounts administered by the Interior Department), the (lower) courts approved a settlement agreement with pervasive intra-class conflicts."

Bank seeks to close down C&A accounts, mail check

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

ARAPAHO, Okla. – A Clinton, Okla., bank is requesting permission to close down more than 30 frozen accounts held by a divided Oklahoma tribe.

On Friday, Aug. 24, First Bank and Trust of Clinton, Okla., filed a petition with the Custer County District Court to close the accounts held by the Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes, currently under the supervision of District Court judge Doug Haught. A hearing on the application is scheduled for Sept. 10.

The Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes have been dealing with a split in leadership for more than 18 months. Janice Prairie Chief-Boswell and Leslie Wandrie-Harjo ran for office and were inaugurated together in January 2010, but their political alliance dissolved over a series of allegations. Each woman has formed her own government, claiming to be the legitimate authority of the Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes.

The tribes' accounts with the bank have been frozen since April 24 after conflicting reports of who had signatory authority for the roughly $6.4 million. As per a June decision by Haught, no one can withdraw any funds from the accounts without a court

If its request is granted, accounts and mail a check to the address of record for the tribes, minus the bank's court costs and attorneys fees.

According to the certificate of service for the filing, the address of record is the tribe's complex in Concho, Okla., where Boswell's government is headquartered.

West Team wins 5th annual Notah Begay III Foundation Challenge

■ New format produced memorable moments for golf fans at annual event to raise awareness and funds to improve health and wellness of Native American youth

VERONA, N.Y. - The West team representing the United States outshot a world-class field of PGA and LPGA stars to capture the fifth annual Notah Begay III (NB3) Foundation Challenge title. Notah Begay III and Tiger Woods led the West squad to victory in the mixed team, best ball tournament at the Atunyote Golf Club at Turning Stone Resort & Casino in central New York. The real winners of the event are Native youth around the nation, who will benefit from the $500,000 raised by the NB3 Foundation to help advance its mission of improving health and wellness in the Native American community.

"Today's Challenge afforded us an invaluable opportunity to bring to light one of the most pressing health disparities facing Indian Country today childhood obesity and diabetes," said the event's host and four-time PGA TOUR winner, Notah Begay III. "To the elite athletes, the Oneida Indian Nation and the dedicated fans who lined the course - thank you for your continued support of the health and well-being of the next generation of Native American leaders."

The new East meets West format, highlighted by a field featuring some of golf's premier players from the PGA TOUR and LPGA and a crowd of eager fans, set the stage for a great afternoon of golf. The West team of Begay, Woods, Rickie Fowler, Gary Woodland, Cristie Kerr and Lexi Thompson emerged as the tournament champions, outpacing K.J. Choi, Se Ri Pak, Yani Tseng, Y.E. Yang, Danny Lee and Charlie Wi of the East team by the score of 8 to 6. Kerr sunk a birdie on the 18 to give the West team the lead and Begay birdied the final hole to clinch the victory.

"The gratification comes not from taking home the trophy for the West, but from playing a role in the betterment of the Native children," said Kerr, who was part of the winning team at the NB3 Foundation Challenge for the third consecutive year. "The real reason we're out on the course today is to shine a spotlight on a community in which the Notah Begay III Foundation is working change? "It's an honor to walk the course with a field of golfers who use their international draw to make a difference in the lives of Native American youth," said Fowler. "Notah's unmatched commitment to a cause that is so near to his heart is inspiring."

the Ultimately, action from the 2012 NB3 Foundation Challenge happens outside the ropes, where all proceeds from the event go to the Notah Begay III Foundation. The money raised through the event supports the commitment to develop sustainable, evidence-based, innovative programs that can achieve significant results in helping to reverse the epidemics of childhood obesity and type 2 diabetes. A statement from the tribe said Crooks died from natural causes but did not go into more details.

"Chairman Crooks was a leader in every sense of the word," tribal vice chairman Charlie Vig said in a statement. "I am honored to have worked with Stanley over the last 20 years. ... We join with his family, friends, and all those who were privileged to know Chairman Crooks in mourning his passing."

Crooks, who became the tribe's chairman in 1992, was a national figure in Indian country, serving as the chairman of the Minnesota Indian Gaming Association for many years and the tribe's representative to the National Indian Gaming Association, as well as to the National Congress of American Indians.

He served in the Navy during the Cuban missile crisis.

"The department's bootstrap reason – that it is the ongoing conduct of an illegal gaming operation that provides the basis for a finding of a 'need' for a proposed trust acquisition in order to cure the illegality of the gaming – is arbitrary and capricious, an abuse of discretion and contrary to the law," Cherokee Nation Attorney General Todd Hembree wrote in Wednesday's filing.

In the approval letter, acting Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs Michael Black also wrote that the United Keetoowah Band and Cherokee Nation have equal jurisdiction across 14 counties in northeastern Oklahoma.

"The secretary's 'former reservation' conclusion is contrary to an unbroken line of prior departmental rulings and to a series of decisions by this court," Hembree wrote. "This conclusion, however, was the basis for the department's unlawful decision to approve the acquisition of 2.03 acres of land located within the last treaty boundaries of the nation... for the use and benefit of the United Keetoowah Band Corporation."

Wednesday's filing only named Black and Secretary of Interior Ken Salazar as defendants. The United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians is not listed.

Indigenous runners relay message of protecting waters from Alaska to Guatemala

SAN MANUEL INDIAN NATION, Calif.

-The San Manuel Band of Mission Indians hosted a leg of the Peace and Dignity Journeys 2012 intertribal run that joins the American continent in a prayer for peace for all peoples, dignity for the Native Nations and awareness of water and indigenous water rights.

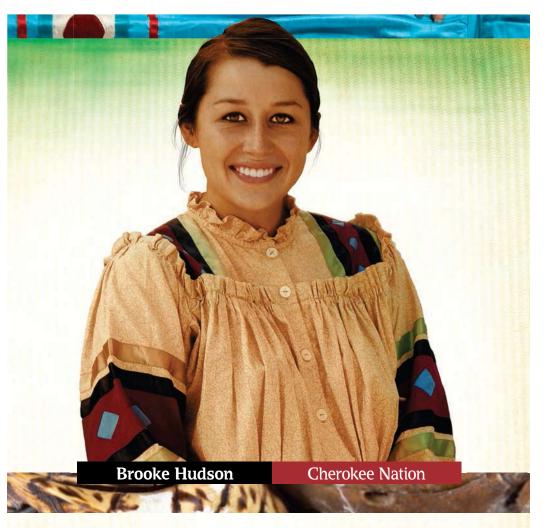

San Manuel leadership greeted and led 20 runners onto the San Manuel Indian Reservation at dusk on the evening August 28, welcoming them to spend the night and share in cultural observances tied to the land and water. The San Manuel Indian Reservation, located along the steep foothills of the San Bernardino Mountains, presented the runners with a physical challenge as they completed their run for the day.

The group is running to raise awareness about water and indigenous water rights including diminishing access to good sources among tribes in Central and South America. The run is held every four years and began in 1992, to bring awareness to the indigenous history of the American Continent as a counterpoint to the 500th anniversary of Columbus' landing. Runners begin on opposite ends of the continents (Chickaloon, Alaska and Tierra del Fuego, Argentina) and run for six months through hundreds of Indigenous communities. The run is broken up into legs with runners relaying prayer staffs among groups of runners with select runners continuing on to Guatemala.

Upon leaving San Manuel runners continued on to Sherman Indian High School in Riverside before embarking for Soboba, Cahuilla and the Quechan Indian Nations.

From left, Marilyn Keepseagle, Claryca Mandan, and Porter Holder, plaintiffs in a class-action lawsuit by American Indian farmers, celebrate outside the federal courthouse in Washington, Tuesday, Oct. 19, 2010. The lawsuit filed in 1999 contends Indian farmers and ranchers lost about $500 million because they were denied USDA loans.

Millions awarded to farmers in government settlement

CHEROKEE NATION News Release

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. - Hundreds of Cherokee farmers received settlement payments this week from the U.S. Department of Agriculture for $50,000 each. The payment stems from the Keepseagle Settlement, which alleged that between 1981 and 1999 the USDA failed to provide technical assistance and, in some cases, denied or charged higher interest rates to Native Americans for farm loans.

"This is something we have diligently worked on for 15 years," said

Principal Chief Bill John Baker. "It was based on the federal government not fulfilling their promises to Cherokee farmers. For years Councilor Joe Byrd and I repeatedly brought up the issue in Washington D.C., and they finally recognized the problem and fixed it. These funds will provide much-needed assistance to Cherokee farmers and ranchers and have a major economic impact on the Cherokee Nation."

Baker reached out to Cherokee County banks and financial institutions to allow recipients to cash or deposit their settlement checks. He said there has been some alarm at so many recipients walking into banks with checks for such large sums of money.

"I hope all of our local banks recognize these checks are legitimate and work with our farmers to process their funds," Baker said.

Eleven-hundred Native American farmers in northeast Oklahoma filed against the USDA, more than anywhere else in the country, according to Alicia Seyler, an Oklahoma tribal representative who assisted with USDA loans through the Intertribal Agricultural Council. The $760 million Keepseagle v. Vilsack suit was settled in 2010.

Those who received checks in August were part of the Track A claims. Claimants with outstanding USDA loans will be notified at the end of October whether some or all of the debt will be relieved. More severe claims, Track B, will be notified by mail by Oct. 30.

The deadline to file a claim was Dec. 27, 2011. For more information on the Keepseagle Settlement, visit www. indianfarmclass.com, or contact Alicia Seyler at (918) 699-9850 or aseyler@ indianaglink.com.

the upcoming election. In the meantime, there would be six months to keep working on areas they know needs to be improved.

"I don't know what will happen in the election but it's full steam ahead until Jan 21, 2013," she said.

Members of the health advisory board were able to ask Roubideaux about funding for the Lawton hospital. The hospital currently operates with upwards of $30 million in federal funds, officials said. She acknowledged that despite the budget recommendations to Congress, the overall budget amount could see a significant under Republican leadership.

"We want to protect what we have here and improve it," said board member Lupe Gooday. "Despite the renovations, the facility is aging and money is needed for improvements. Are we gonna go forward or are we going to be a clinic?"

Roubideaux answered questions but left specific details to local leadership, includingarea officials Admiral Kevin Meeks and Capt. Greg Ketcher who attended the meeting. Unit directors for both Anadarko and Lawton were also present.

Western Delaware official, Watkins said that improvements had targeted some areas but they were concerned with staffing shortages to treat patients who were coming from North Texas and Northeastern Okla., not just the local area. Increased patient loads currently outpaced current funding levels, board members said.

"They expect everything and it costs us a lot and we not funded for it," Watkins said. "By the time the oil boom in the 1980s was over, our Indian hospital was in bad shape."

The facility has reduced staff, discontinued labor and cut inpatient services, relying on contract health care by area mainstream providers over the past decade. Because the Lawton service unit is for direct service tribes, it relies solely on IHSfunding, unlike neighboring tribes who operate under self-governance provisions.

"It's kind of heartbreaking, we're not the only one's suffering, it's going on all over the country," said Lori Gooday Ware, Fort Sill Apache vicechairman.

Roubideaux said she was hearing from some tribal leaders in southwest Okla. that things are getting better, but acknowledged that there's an "enormous need," in Lawton's Indian hospital. She said she envisions a strong partnership between area IHS officials and the health board in the coming year to locate exactly what needs to be addressed. She asked all area unit directors to be more transparent with budget information. "I've heard so many horrible things about this facility," Roubideaux said. "But it's not so bad, there have been are the reinstatement of an operating room and Intensive Care Unit (ICU) as well as the addition of medical specialists for conditions like autoimmune diseases. The immediate plans are to build two additional modular buildings for dental and behavioral health. Improvements in these areas would allow them to update existing spaces for other uses like the emergency room and radiology.

Ketcher said he had a longterm and short-term plan for the Lawton hospital that he would be happy to share with area tribal leaders.

Roubideaux continued to emphasize funding shortages plaguing most Indian health facilities. In budget formulation sessions, IHS estimates that it needs about $7 billion to make all the recommended improvements to IHS facilities across the country. Only $80 million is budgeted for such, which presses IHS to amp up their third-party payments for subsidized government programs like Medicaid and Medicare. At present, Oklahoma declines to expand Medicaid eligibility guidelines that could up government monies for operations, officials

At the end of the two-hour meeting, Roubideaux said that she maintains a strong vision for the Lawton Hospital and wanted to be updated whenever possible about its progress.

"Our plan for Lawton is to change and improve," she said. "I think in a way, Lawton has an image problem but it's changing and improving."

Banking on tradition: Vinita's Oklahoma State Bank looks back and forward at 75

KAREN SHADE Native American Times

VINITA, Okla. – Oklahoma State Bank in Vinita has earned a reputation for solidarity, efficiency and quality – all the hallmarks of a fine thoroughbred in its prime. At 75, this horse is swift to stay ahead of its game.

The bank located at 120 W. Canadian Ave. in the heart of the Craig County seat celebrates this milestone in September at its locations in Vinita as well as its branches in Langley and Monkey Island.

President of Oklahoma State Bank Eddy C. Allensworth said it's "strange at 75," but in a very good way.

"It's a tremendous accomplishment ... and something we're very proud of," he said.

Allensworth has been part of the OSB family since 1989 and can attest to the transformations he has seen in his hometown as well as OSB. A tradition of community spirit continues, which makes its concept of "thoroughbred banking" as personal as it is excellent. Allensworth said he is reminded of this every time he looks at OSB's horse logo.

"It has deeper meaning for me because I've seen where we've come from and the fact that we do progress and we do have to change with the time," he said. "For a small community bank we're on the cutting edge. There are some things (in which) we can outperform and out service the bigger banks on."

To understand OSB, you have to know its beginnings and about the Hartley family.

Officially, OSB opened as Craig County Bank in November 1937, set up by a small group of investors, but its ties stretch way back to Indian Territory and the town of Centralia, northwest of present-day Vinita. In the late 1890s, Centralia was a hub for commerce and eventually became home to two banks. There, OSB Chairman of the Board F.M. (Monty) Hartley's grandfather, Fred Hartley, began work at a bank. Eventually, however, Centralia fell into decline, and other communities grew up along the railroads pushing through Oklahoma. The banks closed like other businesses, and Fred Hartley moved on to Grove. Other bankers in Centralia left, too, some looking to Vinita.

When OSB was chartered in 1937, Vinita was an established community at the junction of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad (now the Burlington Northern Santa Fe Railroad) and the however. To meet ever changing banking regulations, the push for convenience in customer service and the evolving economy of Oklahoma, OSB has diversified into new ventures, including wealth management, health banking (savings accounts) and financing of special tribal projects.

OSB's Chief Information Officer Brian Hartley also leads the bank's Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway (back then called Katy, today known as the Union Pacific).

The Hartleys entered the banking picture again in the late 1950s when Hartley's father, the late Kelly Hartley, joined the bank and became an officer. He began buying shares of the bank gradually to become the majority shareholder and chairman of the board, a position he would pass to his son in 1992.

"We grew up in the agriculture business," F.M. Hartley said. "He was doing cattle inspections and monitoring loans and appraisals."

That aspect hasn't changed much. OSB is still rooted in Craig County's agricultural economics and banks on it.

"Many of the banks across the state will just kind of roll their eyes and look at us and say, 'You make loans on cattle? That's crazy because cattle die," Allensworth said. "We just kind of smile and say, 'Yeah, we're comfortable with that.' We understand where the risks are and feel like we know what we're doing."

Some things have changed, business development sector. When he joined in 2002, he saw how OSB could improve its product to customers through online banking, automatic bill pay and other services now commonplace in the industry. Other upgrades were made to banking software, methods and products.

The bank has been TERO certified through the Cherokee Nation Tribal Employment Rights Office since 2010, affording OSB benefits as a Nativeowned business owing to the Hartleys' Cherokee blood.

Brian Hartley is also the bank's TERO specialist.

"It has given us new opportunities," he said. "It has allowed us to bid on (projects for) different tribes in the area for building hotels, building other ventures they have in businesses. We can help out in the financing side of that"

As a TERO-certified business, OSB is among a number of Native-owned business on the CN's list for special consideration when projects are up for bid, whether it means financing an addition to a casino gaming floor or providing payroll and cash management services. In past 3-5 years, OSB has become more involved in tribe projects.

Such initiatives have allowed this institution to serve customers in 42 states and surpass more than $100 million in assets to date. But OSB very much remains a local bank.

"Small town community banks, I feel, have a purpose," said F.M. Hartley.

Communities have a place for business transactions, and local banks have a clear perspective on what the community wants, F.M. Harley added.

"Hopefully we create a warm feeling in the community with a friendliness that big national banks can't offer," F.M. Hartley said.

Part of that formula is hiring good employees who reflect the community.

"Craig County is deeply rooted in agriculture, and I think that hard work and work ethic is a reflection of the agricultural industry that carries over into the bank," Allensworth said. "It's a reflection of the community that no one's scared to work hard or roll-up their sleeves to do their part ... When you surround yourself with good people, good things happen."

Heath Hartley, OSB's CEO, said this celebration is as much an this celebration is as much an acknowledgement of a supportive community.

"All of the bank's officers and staff share an enthusiasm and passion for Northeastern Oklahoma and continue to have a long standing desire to see it prosper and flourish," Heath Hartley said.

E.M. Hartley added that he is proud of his sons, the bank's officers and staff and that he confident the leadership will take OSB in the right direction in the future.

What would the founders have thought of their creation today?

"I think they would be proud," Allensworth said, "because I think the core values they built the bank on have carried through time in that you try to give good customer service and you try to be fair in all your dealings and be consistent with how you do things."

Cobell

Tucked into the Cobell settlement is an Indian Education Scholarship fund of up to $60 million and tribal trust-land management claims of $1.9 billion, along with compensation for Individual Indian Money account holders or their heirs. These nearly $2 billion awards further eroded the $3.4 billion settlement.

questioned the constitutionality of the settlement since it was first announced," Craven told the Native Sun News. "I'm especially troubled by the creation of the second class, which includes issues which were never part of the quest for an (IIM) accounting. Most of Indian country has no idea why and what they are being paid for."

As for the IIM accounting, Craven states in her cert petition that under the Federal Rules of Procedure (23) "No person shall be deprived of property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public usewithoutjustcompensation" and that due process of law requires adequate counsel representation for all parties.

Craven explains conflicts between the named class members (class representatives), counsel, unnamed parties (absent class members) and any future class members.

In her petition, Craven seeks the court to decide "the quantum of 'evidence' necessary to show an intraclass conflict."

She further seeks a decision as to "whether exorbitant representatives compromise their ability to independently oversee counsel." She says a decision finding just that "would significantly strengthen the enforcement of the adequacy requirement ñ protecting the interests of future generations of class members."

Craven states intra-class

conflicts occurred when "four Class Representatives requested incentive awards and received $2.5 million." She argues this conflict is not in line with federal procedure, which grants all class members adequate counsel and that incentive payments cloud the ability of class representatives to adequately represent the absent class. Additionally, she says counsel may be quick to settle, as per the settlement they stand to receive $99 million.

In her petition, Craven explains the representatives "claimed they were owed over $10.5 million more in 'litigation expenses' that included Representatives' personal rent and public relations related expenses," while absent class members are to receive roughly $1,000 peech

In further clarification, she said the representatives will take home "eight times more money" than other class members whose rent was not compensated for.

"Ms. Cobell requested $10 million, but alone received a $2 million incentive award; Mr. LaRose received a $200,000 award; and the two remaining named plaintiffs took in $150,000 each."

Craven compares the proportion of incentive payments in the Cobell settlement to incentive payments in other class actions. She cites a study by Eisenberg & Miller that states: "The average award per class representative was $15,992, and the median award per class representative was $4,357," which seems a far cry from tens of millions of dollars awarded to Cobell class representatives.

Furthermore, she claims the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia's "opinion creates a circuit split on the question of how to treat incentive payments." As legally defined by federalism. typepad.com, a circuit split is a "disagreement between one or more federal circuit court of appeals on an issue concerning federal statutory or constitutional law."

Craven cites several sources in her cert petition that explain, "There is 'no consistent standard for evaluating and approving special compensation for named plaintiffs."

In comparison to other suits, "some 28 percent of class action settlements include incentive payments to the named plaintiffs, and those payments are usually 'modest,' in the range of a few thousand dollars," she further cites.

She also claims "lower incentive awards are unlikely to push class representatives into agreeing to deals that are bad for the remainder of the class."

As a result, Craven says the absent class (unnamed parties) were denied just compensation and adequate representation, adding that the absent class had to settle for "rough justice" as Congress refused to make funds available for an adequate accounting of the mismanaged trust accounts of each member of the absent class. As stated in court documents, Congress decided through years of litigation "an adequate accounting to each class member was prohibitively expensive."

Seemingly, "rough justice" and fair justice become synonymous as no one knows exactly how much money was mismanaged and how much each individual account is owed. Some recipients will receive far less than they are actually owed. Conversely, some will receive far more than they are actually owed.

Fair becomes 'unbalanced' and rough becomes 'chasmal,' as one of the other three Cobell settlement objectors points out.

Charles Colombe along with Carol Eve Good Bear and Mary Lee Johns are at this point considering filing a brief in the Craven objection to the settlement. Colombe confirmed by phone Aug. 24 that they have obtained an extension to file until Sept.

"We have a dilemma here: a fairness dilemma. I believe there should be a settlement, and I support the government position on that," he told Native Sun News. However, Colombe says the tribes are benefiting from settlement agreements which he supports, but the "individuals are left with less money."

As for the historical accounting of IIM account holders he said, "I am sure (the government) is able to do an accounting. I think the accounting alone would cost more to do than the settlement."

According to the three-party extension court documents, Colombe, Good Bear and Johns filed the extension petition as the deadline for their Supreme Court cert petition would have expired on Aug. 20.

As Craven was also concerned for an opt-out in the settlement for IIM account holders and heirs, these petitioners asked in their extension petition "whether a mandatory class," as the settlement resolves all claims, "can be created in a settlement action for monetary relief without an opt out provision?"

In referring to the extension petition, Colombe told NSN the parties are not sure what or if they may file a brief with the Supreme Court appeal.

The three appellant's joint petition claims, "The (cert petition) will address an important question regarding the lower courts' evasion of this court's (Supreme Court) clear and unequivocal rulings on the essential element of commonality in class action proceedings."

However, the petition states it was also filed as the parties' attorney, David C. Harrison, is also involved in a complex 42-year-old water rights litigation, which made him unable to meet the Aug. 20 deadline to file in the appeal.

In the meantime, the Social Security Administration issued an emergency message stating it "would exclude distributions of tribal trust fund settlements from a member's countable income and resources for purposes of determining eligibility" for receiving certain public benefits, according to a press release from Fredericks Peebles & Morgan LLP posted on www.kawnation.com.

The press release says, "In 2005, the Ute Indian Tribe represented by Fredericks Peebles & Morgan, LLP filed suit against the United States for mismanagement of the Tribe's trust assets and when the Tribe received the settlement funds in March 2012, it distributed the settlement funds on a per capita basis to each of its tribal members. The settlement funds were awarded to the Tribe to settle ongoing litigation against the United States regarding the government's mismanagement of tribal trust assets."

According to the release, the trust fund settlement will not be counted "as income and resources for purposes of determining eligibility for SSI (Supplemental Security Income) or Medicare Part D."

Additionally, "In May of 2012, the Ute Indian Tribe advocated for an exemption of these funds from program eligibility with the Social Security Administration, the State of Utah, Utah state agencies, and several other federal agencies on the basis that a one-time per capita distribution should not affect public assistance currently received by the most vulnerable members of the Tribe's community."

It is unclear how long this latest delay may take and that decision is in the hands of the court.

It's 'International Update Your Resumé Month'

Career Coach and Author Ford R. Myers Offers Five Tips to Develop Attention-Getting Resumes

HAVERFORD, Penn. September marks the 12th annual celebration of "International Update Your Resume Month." The observance, originated by Career Directors International in Melbourne, Florida, provides job seekers with a proactive approach toward obtaining the next step in career growth.

Ford R. Myers, career coach, speaker and author of "Get The Job You Want, Even When No One's Hiring," (John Wiley & Sons, http://www.getthejobbook. com) recommends the following five tips for developing resumes that stand out from the crowd:

1. BE BRIEF: Less is Always

Myers specifically points out that of all the main sections of a resume - Career Summary, Professional Experience, Education, etc. - the Career Summary section is where brevity counts the most.

"The 'Career Summary' is a brief statement of who you are, where you're 'coming from,' and what skills and expertise you have to contribute to an organization. To grab the reader's attention, you'll need five or six targeted lines oriented toward the benefits and contributions you offer as a professional," states Myers.

2. BE SPECIFIC

Although individuals should be as specific as possible throughout the entire resume, this tip should be exercised bmost in the "Professional Experience" section.

"The 'Professional Experience' section is where your past jobs, responsibilities, roles, accomplishments are listed. It's also where most employers and recruiters focus 90% of their attention. The information you present here, and how you present it, can decide the fate of your candidacy within about 10 seconds of scanning Resumes that get noticed focus on specific results. Whenever possible, quantify your results," explains Myers.

3. BE ACTIVE

Myers urges resume writers to use strong action words at the beginning of every sentence.

"Words such as 'direct,' 'launch,' 'initiate,' 'devise' and 'lead' have a lot more impact than a passive phrase like 'was responsible for," states Myers.

4. BE SELECTIVE

Focus on information that is truly relevant to your career goal and edit out the rest. "There is no need to focus on volunteer work or temporary positions if they are not related to the career you're looking for, or if they're in your distant past," says Myers.

5. BE HONEST

Myers warns job seekers to never lie on a resume. "If you lie, you will always lose in the long run," he

"If you find that your resume isn't getting the results you want, change it! Your resume is a 'living document' that will be edited and updated through the course of your job search and your entire career," adds Myers.

Reducing infant mortality focus of statewide initiative

African American and American Indian babies die at higher rates than white babies, according to the Oklahoma State Department of Health (OSDH).

OKLAHOMA CITY - Each year in Oklahoma about 400 babies die before their first birthday. Tragically, babies born in Oklahoma are less likely to survive to 1 year of age than those born in almost any other state in the country.

According to the National Center for Health Statistics, Oklahoma ranks 44th in the United States in infant mortality, the death of a baby that is less than 1 year old. Oklahoma's infant mortality rate is 7.85, which means that almost eight babies die per 1,000 live births in Oklahoma. Further, African American and American Indian babies die at higher rates than white babies, according to the Oklahoma State Department of Health (OSDH).

Many factors contribute to the loss of an infant, such as maternal health, quality and access to medical care, socioeconomic conditions, and health practices of individuals and families. A statewide initiative, Preparing for a Lifetime, It's Everyone's Responsibility, works to positively impact many of those factors that contribute to infant mortality in Oklahoma.

OSDH and Preparing for a Lifetime partners are recognizing September as "Infant Mortality Awareness Month" in Oklahoma. Citizens, including policymakers, health care providers, community leaders, parents, grandparents, neighbors, clergy and others are urged to learn more about infant mortality and how everyone can play a role in addressing the issue, including sharing the following information:

- · Encourage and support a woman's healthy lifestyle choices.
- · Plan for pregnancy and strive to be healthy before and between pregnancies.
- · Take 400 mcg of folic acid daily to help reduce chances of having a baby with birth defects.
- · Quit smoking and provide a smoke-free environment for baby.
- · Get tested and treated, if needed, for sexually-transmitted diseases.
- · Have a full-term pregnancy (about 40 weeks).
- · Know the signs and get help for postpartum depression.

- · Install and use properly an ageappropriate car seat.
- · Watch baby at all times and never leave a baby unattended.

"Too many Oklahoma families and communities suffer from the heartbreaking death of a baby," said State Health Commissioner Dr. Terry Cline. "Actions we take now can influence the health and well being of Oklahoma babies for their entire lifetime and improve the health status of our state as well."

During September, Preparing for a Lifetime partners will work in their communities to distribute walletsize resource cards with health tips, helpful websites, and health resource telephone numbers to women of childbearing age and to locations where they frequently visit. ADA, Okla. - Storytelling, cooking classes, collaborations with schools and farmers' market programs are among the creative approaches the Chickasaw Nation is using to meet their goal of better educating its clients on the advantages of healthy lifestyle choices.

"It is important that we continue to adults become enthusiastic about healthy lifestyle choices," said Bill Anoatubby, Governor of the Chickasaw Nation. "These programs encourage people to develop habits that can help them lead healthier, more productive lives for years to come."

A favorite among area children is the Chickasaw Nation's Eagle Adventure program. This program aims to fight the increasing numbers of Native American children who are at risk for type-2 diabetes. The program teaches children in grades 1-3 and their families by using the tradition of storytelling and lessons to show the joys of physical activity, eating healthy foods and learning traditional healthy habits from their elders. Since 2010, more than 2,000 children have participated in the program.

Nationally, September is Fruit and Veggie Month and Whole Grains Month. During this time, the Chickasaw Nation Nutrition Services Department offers opportunities to help citizens make healthier food decisions. The department includes a Food Distribution program that provides nutrition education, food demonstrations, cooking classes, and food packages. In addition, it provides commodity foods through FDP grocery stores with fresh

The program serves more than 4,200 Native American families in the Chickasaw Nation's 13-county jurisdiction located in south-central Oklahoma.

Nearly one-third of adults in Oklahoma develop new methods to help children and are obese, according to a recent report released by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Among Native American populations, the number is even higher. The Department of Health and Human Services' Office of Minority Health estimates that nearly 33 percent of all Native American and Alaskan Natives, both children and adults, are obese. The resulting health consequences are well documented, with diabetes and heart disease being abnormally present in Native American communities across the

The Chickasaw Nation works to combat these statistics by educating its people and communities on the advantages of a healthy diet and exercise.

Other nutrition services projects, such as the Summer EBT for Children demonstration project, are focused on nutrition of area children. The project, still in the testing phase, provides nutritious food to children during the summer months, when they do not have the luxury of a reliable source, such as a school lunch program. More than 5,300 students in 41 Oklahoma public school districts were awarded funding for summer-time food.

Though it is an uphill battle against obesity and the ever-present fast-food lifestyle, the Chickasaw Nation sees a bright future because of their dedication and variety of services aimed to educate its citizens and communities about the benefits of a healthy lifestyle.

Purple baby caps: A reminder not to shake

Frustration with a crying baby during the first few weeks or months of life is the number one trigger for the shaking and abuse of infants. In an effort to help spread awareness about normal infant crying and the dangers of shaking an infant, a project new to Oklahoma called "Click for Babies, Period of PURPLE Caps," invites knitters and crocheters across the state to make purple-colored baby caps which will be distributed to newborns in participating hospitals as part of the Period PURPLE® Crying program.

The Period of PURPLE® Crying (PPC) program offers a DVD and educational materials to participating Oklahoma hospitals to provide education to parents of newborns about normal infant crying and what to do when one becomes frustrated with a crying child. Parents are shown the video in the hospital and then given a copy to share with others who may take care of the baby after leaving the hospital. The handmade purple caps serve as an additional reminder to parents about the normal "period of purple crying" that some babies may experience and the dangers of reacting with frustration by shaking or abusing an infant. Currently, 25 Oklahoma hospitals participate in the PPC program.

When a caregiver shakes a baby, it can cause serious trauma to the brain, even causing death or serious injuries. A recent review of ten years of Oklahoma

Child Death Review Board physical abuse data indicated 75.5 percent of the physical abuse deaths were caused by abusive head trauma, with many a result of shaking the baby.

Oklahoma knitters are being recruited to each make from five to 50 purple knit caps that will be distributed to babies born in participating Oklahoma hospitals this November. Volunteers are asked to help knit or crochet purplecolored newborn baby caps using any newborn baby cap pattern and any shade of soft, baby-friendly purple yarn. Send the caps by October 1 to: Lisa Rhoades, Oklahoma Child Death Review Board, 1111 N. Lee, Suite 500, Oklahoma City, OK 73103.

"We encourage clubs and community groups that knit and crochet to join this effort," said Ann Benson of the Maternal and Child Health Service at the Oklahoma State Department of Health. "If we have a positive response, we hope to offer the knitted caps for newborns every year. Knitters are needed, so spread the word!" As part of the "Click for Babies" project, the public is invited to attend a "knitin" Thursday, Sept. 6, 2012, from noon to 2 p.m. at the Embassy Suites Hotel in Norman, Oklahoma. Those participating in the "knit in" should contact Benson at (405) 271-4471 or email AnnRB@health.ok.gov.

The Period of PURPLE® Crying (PPC) program and the "Click for Babies" project are part of Oklahoma's "Preparing for a Lifetime, It's Everyone's Responsibility" initiative to reduce infant deaths in the state. To learn more, visit http://iio.health. ok.gov.

POTEAU, Okla. - Porch lights across the nation are beaming love, reflecting a loss and lighting a path for 18-month-old Liam Lyon, who "earned his wings" Sept.

William Elijah Lyon, affectionately known as Liam, was born Feb. 18, 2011 with a congenital heart defect known as hypoplastic left heart syndrome. He had half a heart; with only two chambers and one ventricle.

Liam spent most of his life growing up in Arkansas Children's Hospital and Children's Hospital at St. Francis in Tulsa. After four open chest surgeries before he turned 6 months old, he underwent the one surgery needed to save his life. On July 25, 2011, Liam received a heart transplant.

Liam's grandmother Nanci Tankersley previously told Native Times of the heart transplant, "I just can't explain how thankful we are, and then there's no way that we can put into words our gratitude for the donor family. I don't think we could ever say thank you enough. I mean, there's no way and for them to have to deal with their son ... it's just bitter sweet."

After the transplant Liam continued to have ups and downs, but he continued to roar. A year ago his parents Whitney and Brody Lyon of Cameron, Okla. were learning to actively care for him and he was being fed through a

the religious organizations that ran the school.

In two rulings, the high court upheld a trial judge's decision to dismiss the lawsuits against the diocese and several groups that ran St. Paul's School in Marty at the time of the alleged abuse more than 35 years ago.

The Supreme Court said the students waited too long to sue Blue Cloud Abbey of northeastern South Dakota, Pennsylvania-based Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, and the Oblate Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament of Marty, which operated the school and provided priests, nuns and others to work there.

The justices also said the students cannot sue the diocese because it did not operate or control the school and it was not acting Interior Board of Indian Appeals approved a motion Sept. 6 to authorize the Bureau of Indian Affairs to fund several government contracts awarded to an embattled Oklahoma tribe.

Cherokee council files lawsuit over redistricting

■ The suit alleges that the map is gerrymandered to remove some councilors' seats.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. - Cherokee Nation Tribal Council is heading to court over a redistricting plan adopted in July.

Two petitions for declaratory judgment have been filed in the tribe's district court concerning a 15-district map passed at the council's meeting on July 16 by a 10-7 margin.

Currently, the council is divided into five districts with three seats each, with two additional seats for at-large citizens. Under legislation adopted in 2010, the Tribal Council was under a self-imposed mandate to design and implement a 15-district map by Aug. 1 for the 2013 election, which will have nine of the 17 seats on the ballot.

The first was filed on Aug. 31 on behalf of the council as a whole against the tribe's election commission.

"While a majority of the council approved and passed this legislation, and is presumptively constitutional, it was not a unanimous decision," wrote council attorney Dianne Barker-Harrold in the legislative branch's petition. "In order to determine the validity and constitutionality of this legislation, the Council of the Cherokee Nation seeks a declaratory judgment so this legislation is final and will allow timely preparation for the 2013 Cherokee Nation elections without any further dispute."

Councilors Buel Anglen of Skiatook, Okla., Jack Baker of Oklahoma City, Julia Coates of Tahlequah, Okla., Cara Cowan Watts of Claremore, Okla., and Lee Keener of Claremore, Okla., filed the second one last Wednesday afternoon against the tribe's government as a whole, along with a request for an injunction to prevent the changes from being enacted. The map was passed with an emergency clause, which allowed for it to be enacted immediately upon Principal Chief Bill John Baker's signature.

Anglen, Cowan Watts and Keener represent tribal citizens in Rogers County and northern Tulsa County. Baker and Coates represent citizens who live outside the Cherokee Nation's 14-county jurisdictional area and would not be directly impacted by the redistricting efforts.

In their petition, the five councilors maintain that the map passed by council is unconstitutional because it does not evenly divide the tribe's citizens who live within its jurisdictional area among 15 defined, relatively compact districts.

In the Voter District Amendment Act of 2012, passed on July 16, the proposed 15 districts and their current occupants are named, but no definitive boundaries are spelled out. According to the map passed out of the council's rules committee in June, 106,772 Cherokee Nation citizens live within the tribe's 14-county jurisdictional area, putting the optimum population for a single district at 7,115.

Based on those figures, the district populations range from 6,466 in the proposed District 11 to 7,822 in the proposed District 14. District 11 would consist of Craig County and portions of Nowata and Mayes counties. District 14 would be portions of Rogers and Tulsa

That data does not include the estimated 12,000 Cherokee Nation citizens with unverified or bad addresses on file with the tribe due to various reasons, including mailing address shifts brought on by 911 implementation efforts in some counties. Officials said those citizens were sent two mailers or visited at home to request them to update their address with the tribe. After two attempts, those addresses were no longer counted for redistricting purposes.

"The Cherokee citizens of Tulsa, Mayes, Washington, Rogers, Cherokee and Delaware counties are being shorted adequate political representation based on population and tribal monies," Cowan Watts said. "Right now, apportionment based on bad addresses created by 911 arbitrarily moves folks to the atlarge population rather than count them where they live."

The suit also alleges that the map is gerrymandered to remove some councilors' seats while protecting the seats of several council members who voted in favor of the proposal.

Under the adopted map, Cowan Watts and Keener, who were both elected to a four-year term in 2011, would live within the same district. Anglen, whose term is up in 2013, would be in a district represented by fellow councilor Dick Lay of Ochelata, Okla., whose term does not expire until 2015.

"Cherokee people elect their representation," Keener said. "Some on the tribal council are trying to take that right away."

The suit specifically questions the proposed districts that would be represented by current councilors Tina Glory-Jordan, Joe Byrd, David Walkingstick, Jodie Fishinghawk and Frankie Hargis.

"These five members of the majority live in close proximity to other incumbents and all have districts carefully drawn to give them individual districts," Parris wrote.

Currently, Fishinghawk and Hargis represent Adair, Delaware and southwestern Ottawa counties. Speaker Glory-Jordan, Walkingstick and Byrd represent Cherokee and eastern Wagoner counties.

Cherokee Nation Attorney General Todd Hembree did not respond to requests for comment.

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) - A federal judge has formally sentenced the former president of the Tonkawa Tribe of Oklahoma to 41 months in prison for conspiring to embezzle funds from the tribe.

U.S. District Judge Robin Cauthron also on Thursday ordered Anthony Street to pay $794,904 in restitution.

A grand jury indicted Street in October for allegedly conspiring with ex-Vice President Gordon Warrior and Secretary-Treasurer Dawena Pappan to embezzle more than $500,000 from the tribe's general fund. Prosecutors allege the three began writing checks to themselves after taking office in 2005.

Street pleaded guilty in June to conspiring to embezzle tribal funds. Warrior and Pappan previously pleaded guilty to embezzling casino proceeds and were sentenced to fiveyear terms of probation.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

PONCA CITY, Okla. - Some Natives are crying foul over a local law enforcement agency's alleged treatment of a runner and eagle feather staff.

On Wednesday, Sept. 5, two Kay County sheriff's deputies detained a participant in the Peace and Dignity Journeys 2012 tour on U.S. Highway 177 near Ponca City, Okla., after receiving calls about a "suspicious-looking man" in an area that has recently had a rash of burglaries.

According to dashboard camera footage obtained and published by the Ponca City News, the Mohawk runner was asked to lie down on the ground and let go of a two-foot red staff covered with fur, deer antlers and eagle feathers. The runner was handcuffed and subjected to a criminal background check, as was a representative from the Peace and Dignity Journeys tour. Both were shortly released.

Despite previous published reports that guns were drawn, none were visible in the video footage.

Kay County Undersheriff Steve Kelley could not be reached for comment.

Started in 1992, the Peace and Dignity Journey happens once every four years, starting simultaneously in Chickaloon, Alaska, and Tierra del Fuego, Argentina. The runners are scheduled to meet later this year in Guatemala.

US attorneys, tribal officials talk public safety

JAMES MacPHERSON Associated Press

BISMARCK, N.D. (AP) -Criminal prosecutions have soared on American Indian reservations in the Dakotas in the past year, though tribal officials told federal prosecutors Thursday that more needs to be done to quell crime.

Fifteen U.S. attorneys from Alaska to New York, who make up the Department of Justice's Native American Issues Subcommittee, met in Bismarck to discuss public safety issues with tribal leaders. U.S. attorney Brendan Johnson of South Dakota is chairman of the group; Timothy Purdon of North Dakota is vice-chairman.

Tribal officials from the Dakotas told the federal prosecutors law enforcement funding resources continue to lack in Indian Country.

Associated Press

Robert Shepherd, chairman of the Sisseton-Wahpeton Oyate tribe in northeastern South Dakota southeastern North Dakota, said funding for public safety is an obligation the federal government has to the tribes.

"We can't do anything until money is available," Shepherd

The top federal prosecutors in the Dakotas said they have made crime in Indian Country a priority among issues.

Johnson said criminal prosecutions have increased 20 percent in the past year in Indian Country in South Dakota, while Purdon said the increase in prosecutions in North Dakota is up about 30 percent.

They said the numbers do not necessarily reflect a jump in crime, but an increase in cases taken up by federal

"We're spending more time in Indian Country than we ever have and we're spending more time with tribal leaders," Johnson told The Associated Press. "When you do that, you usually get results."

Purdon said he has assigned assistant U.S. attorneys to each of North Dakota's reservations and will have them visit their assigned reservations monthly to work with tribal prosecutors.

Charles Murphy, Standing Rock tribal chairman, said the reservation's police force is short-staffed and sometimes only one officer is on duty to patrol the 2.3 million-acre reservation that straddles North Dakota and South Dakota.

"The reason why is funding," Murphy said. "We do not have enough men out there."

Murphy told the AP that a more than $5 million jail facility for juvenile offenders has been completed for about a year but has not yet opened because of red tape. He said officers often have to transport iuvenile offenders to other jails in the Dakotas, taking time away from patrols.

Darren Cruzan, director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs' Office of Justice Services, said the lockup would be open by year's end.

Standing Rock council member Sharon Two Bears said tribes have to compete for public safety funding and the application process is confusing. Housing often isn't available on the reservations for police officers.

Merle St. Clair, chairman of North Dakota's Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa, said the tribal court system on the reservation is in "chaos" and backlogged with cases.

Unlike some tribal courts, the judicial system on the Turtle Mountain reservation is run by its own members.

"I want the Department to take over the court," St. Clair said. "You cannot have a tribal judge hearing her own son's case."

Three Affiliated Tribes Chairman Tex Hall said crime has increased with an exploding population on the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, located within North Dakota's western booming oil patch.

Hall estimated that about 10,000 people are working in the region, which has brought both prosperity and problems to the reservation.

"Our restaurants are full, our hotels are full and our jail is full," Hall said. "There is a downside to it."

Hall said the tribe lacks jurisdiction to prosecute non-Indians on the reservation, and that's widely known and must change.

Non-tribal citizens are welcome on the reservation, he said. "But if you break a tribal law, or if you break a federal law, you will be arrested."

Tribe boosts jail time for reservation crime FELICIA FONSECA in Oregon, have put together all the FLAGSTAFF, Ariz. (AP) – The Hopi "The main thing is it will improve will be one of the earliest tribes to our law and order on the reservation, increase criminal sentences under a so we have a better way of protecting landmark federal law meant to improve any victims," Hopi Chairman Le Roy Shingoitewa said Wednesday. "If public safety on American Indian reservations - where a historic gap in something happens, we now have the U.S. justice system has left tribes stronger teeth in making sure the perpetrators are punished. It's a huge with little authority over offenders on their lands. step forward for us."

The changes place the Hopi in a The Hopi tribe recently updated its position of leadership, as the first criminal code for the first time since 1972 with changes that comply with Arizona tribe to implement the longer provisions of the Tribal Law and Order sentences. government does or how fast it acts," Tuchi said. "It gives the tribes the opportunity to take more control of public safety."

The Hopi worked for 18 months to update the code, which includes an expansion of what had been one sex crime listed under tribal law and addresses stalking, disturbance of religious ceremonies, bootlegging and illegal drug use. It also needed to have at least one law-trained judge to handle the felony cases and provide public defenders to meet the requirements under the Tribal Law and Order Act.

Crimes against women, assaults resulting in serious bodily injury and domestic offenses have plagued the reservation. Tribal members told Hopi lawmakers before a vote on updating the code how they and their families suffered as victims of crime. One man who recently was released from jail even acknowledged his wrongdoing and praised the Tribal Council for moving toward stiffer sentences, Shingoitewa said.

What needs to be communicated to the public now is to "start reporting them," said Wayne Kuwanhyoima, chairman of the Hopi Tribal Council's Law Enforcement Task Team. On the Umatilla reservation, some crimes already have been charged under a list of about 50 felonies. Everyone there is entitled to a public defender regardless of whether they're indigent, and a judge who has been on the bench for 30 years is law trained.

"It's been working great so far," said Brent Leonhard, an attorney in the Office of Legal Counsel. "Certainly as with all tribes, we could use more resources. There's always a concern with being able to afford jail space when we do sentence to an extended period of time."

The lack of funding to implement the federal law has been a major concern for tribes considering longer sentences.

The federal Bureau of Prisons has space for up to 100 offenders convicted of felonies in tribal courts who are sentenced to at least two years, but justice officials say those spaces are expected to fill up quickly as more tribes take advantage of the enhanced

That requirement was removed during the 2012 legislative session, but the position's extended vacancy gave Hensley more ground to cover once she was appointed.

"I've been going around to all the tribes to introduce myself," she said. "I've spent the better part of the last three to four weeks making the rounds, meeting with tribal governments to find out about their concerns and trying to schedule roundtable discussions for later this year." Among the potential topics for those discussions are compacts with the state. Hensley said that while the governor has the final word for the state, her position will allow for more conversation and potential compromises.

"My role is to take the compact proposals to the tribes, see what they like and don't like, then take that feedback back to the governor's office," Hensley said. "Hopefully there will be more input this time around."

Hensley was not involved in the recently signed tobacco compact between the state of Oklahoma and the Muscogee (Creek) Nation, as the negotiations were almost completed by the time she took office. However, she said she will play an active role in future compact talks. "I meet with the governor

Tribe secures money in effort to buy sacred land

KRISTI EATON
Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) – A Native American tribe trying to buy land it considers sacred in South Dakota's picturesque Black Hills is in negotiations with the landowners and has secured money for a deposit, though no final agreement has been reached, tribe officials said last Tuesday.

The nearly 2,000 acres of pristine prairie grass plays a key role in the creation story of the tribes making up the Great Sioux Nation, and members fear that new owners would develop the property. The land, which the tribes call Pe' Sla, is the only sacred site on private land outside Sioux control.

The Rosebud Sioux Tribe, whose reservation is among the closest to the land, has allocated an undisclosed amount of money as an earnest deposit on the land, though tribe spokesman Alfred Walking Bull said that he couldn't specify the amount or where negotiations stood with the land owners.

"Basically, Rosebud is working out the details and the details will be forthcoming as early as next week," he said.

The tribe had earlier said it was allocating $1.3 million to the cause, and donations to an online fundraising effort totaled about $300,000 last week, though tribal officials fear that the land could sell for between $6 million and $10 million.

The landowners, Leonard and Margaret Reynolds, declined comment. An auction to sell that land had been scheduled for Aug. 25, but the couple cancelled it a few days before without commenting. Walking Bull said both sides have been working through a third party to handle negotiations.

Despite the hushed negotiations, tribe supporters praised the news of the progress.

"We are very pleased we've reached this positive milestone," said Chase Iron Eyes, a member of the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe who led the online fundraising effort. He said supporters planned a celebration rally in Rapid City.

The tribes believe the Sioux people were created from the Black Hills. According to part of their spiritual tradition, Pe' Sla is where the Morning Star fell to Earth, killing seven beings that killed seven women. The Morning Star placed the souls of the women into the night sky as "The Seven Sisters," also known as the Pleiades constellation.

Tribal citizens hold ceremonies and rituals on the land.

ABUSE

The legal fight started in 2003, when former students at St. Paul's School and another Indian boarding school in South Dakota filed a federal lawsuit seeking $25 billion in damages from the federal government for the alleged mental, physical and sexual abuse of students at the schools.

After the federal lawsuit was dismissed, the former students filed lawsuits in state court alleging that the religious organizations that ran the schools failed to protect students and were negligent in hiring, retaining and supervising staff.

St. Paul's School was founded in 1922 by religious organizations, but ownership and control were transferred to the Yankton Sioux Tribe in 1975.

At issue in the case was a state law that requires a lawsuit seeking damages for childhood sexual abuse to be filed within three years of the alleged abuse or within three years of the time the victim discovered or should have discovered that an injury was caused by the abuse. The students argued that they should get an extended time to file their lawsuits because they did not discover until much later that their injuries were caused by the alleged abuse.

However, the Supreme Court said the law giving extra time to file such lawsuits only applies in lawsuits against those who engaged in intentional conduct or actually committed the abuse. The former students' lawsuits do not claim any intentional conduct by the religious organizations that ran the school, and there is no evidence that the organizations engaged in criminal conduct, the justices said.

Another law gives victims of childhood sexual abuse until they turn 19 to file such lawsuits, but none of the lawsuits was filed in state court until 2004, long after the youngest former student turned 19 in 1981, Justice Steven Zinter wrote for the court.

"Therefore, none of the students commenced his or cause of action until more than twenty years after the time for filing suit had expired," Zinter wrote.

The lawsuits also argued that the Catholic Diocese could be held liable because the abuse was committed in the scope of employment by priests, nuns and others at the school. But the Supreme Court said the alleged sex abuse was outside the scope of employment and was not committed in pursuit of any diocese business.

The students also contended the diocese should be liable because it exercised control over the school, its employees and the religious organizations that operated it, but the Supreme Court said there is no evidence that the diocese was controlling the school's operation or that the religious organizations were running the school for the diocese.

The high court also rejected the students' argument that the diocese could be sued because it failed to protect students at the school

"The students identified no facts indicating that the Diocese – as opposed to the priests, monks, nuns, entity defendants, and the school – was acting as the custodian or parent of the students while they attended school," Zinter wrote for the court.

Duo to see canonization of Mohawk saint

A woman and her daughter will make the journey to the Vatican in October to see Kateri Tekakwitha declared America's first Indigenous saint - completing her mother's quest.

ANITA FRITZThe Recorder

ERVING, Mass. (AP) – Thirty-two years after her mother traveled to the Vatican for the beatification of a Native American Catholic woman who had died 300 years before that, Anna Jarvis will travel to Rome with her daughter, Roberta Allen, for the canonization of Kateri Tekakwitha.

The tearful pair said that to be at the Vatican when Pope Benedict XVI declares the Native American of Mohawk decent, known as Lily of the Mohawks, a saint will be almost as exciting as being there for Jarvis' mother, who died in 1993 and would have loved to have known her family completed her quest.

"She so wanted to see Kateri canonized," said Allen of Erving. "She worked very hard to help get her there."

Tekakwitha will be America's first indigenous saint.

In 1980, Josephine Warisose Angus traveled to the Vatican to watch the beatification of Kateri Tekakwitha, which is a recognition by the Roman Catholic Church of a dead person's entrance into Heaven and the capacity for the church to intercede on behalf of individuals who pray in that person's name. Pope John Paul II performed the ceremony at that time and Tekakwitha was given the title, "Blessed Kateri."

"My grandmother was a member and one of the first officers of the Akwesasne Kateri Circle, a group that advocated for her canonization," said Allen. "We were asked by the Kateri Circle to go to the canonization in my grandmother's name."

Allen said all Mohawk reservations have a Kateri Circle. She, her grandmother and her mother, like Tekakwitha, are of Mohawk descent – and all three are Catholic like Tekakwitha.

"You have to live on a reservation to be a member of the circle. That's why we had to be asked," said Jarvis of Erving.

Jarvis said that like Tekakwitha, her mother was committed to the Catholic faith. But, she said, in the 1600s, unlike over the past few decades, turning outside of Mohawk faith was frowned upon.

"Kateri faced ridicule for converting to Christianity," said Jarvis. "I'm glad my mother didn't."

Pope Benedict XVI cleared the way last December for Tekakwitha to become a saint, something the two women weren't sure would ever happen.

"The only sad thing is that my mother didn't get to see this happen," said Jarvis.

There are four steps to becoming a saint in the Catholic religion:

First, the church opens an investigation into the virtues of the individual after members of the faith petition it to do so.

Second, the body is exhumed and examined.

Third, the person is recommended for sainthood and beatification takes place.

Finally, the person is canonized, but only after the church attributes two miracles to him or her.

Jarvis and Allen said the two miracles connected with Tekakwitha are the smallpox scars that disappeared from her face when she died in 1680, and the recovery of a dying boy in Seattle, Wash., in 2006, which was 326 years after her death.

It appears the Native American woman who was born in 1656 and grew up in the Mohawk Valley in New York watched her parents and siblings die of smallpox. She contracted the disease when she was a teen, but survived with some damage to her eyesight and with facial scars.

When she died, those who buried her said she glowed and her scars disappeared, according to investigations done by the Catholic Church.

In 2006, a 6-year-old boy cut his lip during a game in Washington. His face swelled and he developed a fever and according to reports by the church, doctors at Seattle Children's Hospital said a flesheating bacteria was attacking his face. It eventually destroyed his lips, cheeks and forehead.

Catholics from around the world began to pray to Kateri Tekakwitha – she was chosen because of the facial scars she lived with, said Allen – and soon after, the disease inexplicably stopped progressing and the boy recovered.

The Catholic Church declared it a miracle after a 31/2-year investigation.

Tekakwitha will become America's first Indigenous saint in October.

"I'm so proud to go for my mother," said Jarvis. "I never dreamed I'd have the same chance she did so many years ago."

Allen said her grandmother will have tears in her eyes, if she knows about Tekakwitha and about her daughter and granddaughter making the trip.

"She's dancing in Heaven," said Allen. "She's doing a ceremonial dance. I can hear her moccasins." Jarvis and Allen said they don't know what to expect when they get to the Vatican, but can't wait to meet the pope. The two said they received some donations to help cover their costs of their trip and saved the rest.

"I've been doing extra landscaping jobs all summer," said Allen, who has been a special education paraprofessional at Erving Elementary School for the past 16 years.

Jarvis is a retired caregiver who has six children, 19 grandchildren and 32 greatgrandchildren.

They said it will cost about $1,000 each to make the eight-day trip, which will included local guided tours and the canonization ceremony. They will leave the area on Oct. 17 to spend the night on a reservation in Canada and will leave from Montreal on Oct. 18.

The mother-daughter pair will hold a fundraiser – their final push – on Sept. 15 at The Route 63 Roadhouse in Millers Falls at 2 p.m.

They are selling 100 tickets at $20 each for a raffle that will have four winners, with prizes of $500, $250, $100 and $50. There were 10 tickets left at the end of last week.

Allen said there will also be a coffee can raffle to raffle off numerous items donated by local businesses and individuals, a 50-50 raffle and free food. She said the event is free and open to the public.

"Anyone who wants to stop by is welcome," she said. "If anyone would like to bring a dish, that would be nice, too."

For more information, or to purchase one of the "main raffle" tickets, call Allen at 413-824-8811.

gastronomy tube, or Mickey button, until he learned how to swallow. He also began sleeping in a crib. Overall, the focus remained to get Liam home. The efforts worked.

Liam was transferred to Children's Hospital at St. Francis in Tulsa on Nov. 16, 2011 to heal and be closer to family. On Nov. 22, 2011, Liam left the hospital and made his first journey home to Cameron, Okla. He spent Thanksgiving with his parents and big sister Cheyanne.

"He's the strongest person I ever met ... He's the biggest fighter I've ever, ever seen. For somebody that small to be able to go through as much as he has it's amazing ... He's really taught me a lot. For him to go through all of this that he's gone through and still be able to smile, that says a lot about a person. It puts everything into perspective ... he's such an amazing little boy," Whitney Lyon, Choctaw, previously told Native Times.

Liam went back into the hospital after Thanksgiving weekend and eventually fluid began to collect in his belly and later throughout his body. His inferior vena cava (one of the two main veins bringing deoxygenated blood from the body to the heart) was no longer functional and he needed collateral circulation so blood could flow to the heart for oxygenation.

In December 2011, the family began a national search for experts in collateral circulation willing to help Liam. Some of the nation's top pediatric transplant and cardiology teams thought Liam's conditions were too complex or needed further evaluation. Boston Children's Hospital was willing to evaluate Liam and helped to partially open the inferior vena cava to improve drainage so his body would not retain fluid and swell. He returned to Arkansas Children's Hospital where he spent his first birthday. In March he was moved to Children's Hospital at St. Francis in Tulsa. By April he began to fade and, "He was so swollen he was almost unrecognizable - he couldn't bend - his skin was cracked and dry - and they said 'he had little chance for a meaningful recovery," Liam's aunt Susan Pickle posted on Liam's Facebook page.

At that point a Do Not Resuscitate (DNR) order was in place, and 11,000 people flicked on their porch lights and prayed for Liam. He heard them, and once again roared back causing the DNR to be revoked. Liam was baptized and in May candlelight vigils were ignited in Oklahoma and around the world. Meanwhile the family continued their "One Doctor" campaign, which sought one physician from a major hospital equipped and willing to help Liam survive. As they waited Liam's health continued to have highs and lows; hopes were lifted then dashed. The family was turned down by major hospitals and encouraged by some physicians to sign another DNR, yet they clenched onto their hope and continued to "believe."

The family now needed a thoracic surgeon proficient in tracheoesophageal fistula (TEF) surgery. In August, Dr. David Morales of Cincinnati Children's Hospital said yes. The family climbed the mountain of medical records, insurance and transportation arrangements to get Liam to Cincinnati. As soon as he arrived on Aug 21, Liam was in crisis mode. The medical team opted to drain the excess fluid from his abdomen, a procedure that no other physicians had been willing to do over the last six months. Later a triple scope procedure revealed there was not a tracheoesophageal fistula, but a pouch. His airways were washed and cleaned out then discussion began on how to correct his clotted inferior vena cava and an infection he developed. He also had a biopsy, along with a handful of other procedures and treatments. The biopsy results came back Aug. 31 and showed his heart had no signs of rejection. However, Liam began having difficulties and on Sept. 3, he died cradled in his parents' arms.

"Heaven has a new angel, that bright shining star above, Liam has changed us forever. Fly high baby boy ... Grandma Nanci said it best – we're shattered ..." Aunt Susan posted on Facebook.

Liam's Facebook page, http://www.facebook.com/pages/I-Love-Liam-Lyon/137992366273067, has been an outlet for friends and family to share the tears and the triumphs of Liam's life. To date, Liam has 89, 770 friends worldwide and the numbers continue to climb. His best buddy was Curious George, and needless to say, lions. T-shirts were made with a lion's head in the center and the words Team Liam, Hear me Roar printed on them.

The family motto remains "Believe" and anyone who wishes to help the family through donations can send them to the William Elijah Lyon account at Simmons First National Bank in Fort Smith, Ark.; directly to Liam's great-grandfather, Paul Tankersley, at 234433 Shoup Rd, Cameron, OK 74932; or as a personal gift via PayPal at iloveliamlyon@ yahoo.com. The family would like to create a non-profit organization for advocacy and support to families with chronically ill children. The organization will be called, I Love Liam Lyon.

Liam's Celebration of Life memorial service was held at 2 p.m.

Sept. 9, at the Reynolds Center in Poteau, Okla. Liam's final bed was draped in fall colored flowers with a Curious George stuffed animal snuggled on top. On that day, in Poteau and around the world, red balloons danced high above the earth tickling the blue sky on their way up to Liam.

"I can't imagine your view from Heaven at the millions of red balloons going up for you today!" Jaime Allison Wagner from Austintown, Ohio wrote to Liam on his Facebook page. "You are so missed, so loved and will always be remembered!"

Jackie Killian Dunlaney was also one of the hundreds of people who wrote to Liam as he was being laid to rest. She wrote, "Oh Dearest Liam. Even though we've never met, I have thought of you every day since the first day I've known about you! I can never know the pain your family is feeling ... My heart is heavy today. I will continue to pray exceptionally hard for your family as I prayed hard for you. I love you as if you were my own. Fly high little wing for you have brought so much joy and faith to so many people worldwide ..."

Members of Liam's Facebook family around the world were able to view Liam's service via http://www.shawnsanomaly.org/ where there is also a video tribute to Liam with "The Lion Sleeps Tonight" playing in the background.

But this is true of most major businesses in South Dakota: look upon the fastest growing population in the state as consumers and, indeed, still look at Native Americans as poverty stricken welfare recipients.

Pennsylvania westward to Ohio. Members of what would become the Absentee Shawnee pushed on to Missouri while the Shawnee Tribe ancestors were relocated to Kansas. A smaller band began traveling and living among the Seneca, and together, they were forced into Indian Territory in 1832 around the Grand Lake region. The rest of the Shawnee would soon follow.

It was in the Ohio River Valley, where Tecumseh, the great Shawnee leader, made a stand in 1812 with his Indian confederacy and vision of a separate nation against the U.S. government for the right to remain in the tribe's increasingly shrinking territory. As it was in his time, the Newark Earthworks are still visible, constructed with precision by a mound building people known as the Hopewell culture more than 2,000 years ago. Today, the intricate complex of earthworks structures is now home to an education center of the Ohio State University of Newark for the preservation of ancient American Indian architectural sites.

At first, Newark seemed like a long way from the Eastern Shawnee Tribe's present-day offices on the Oklahoma-Missouri border and in Wyandotte - both literally and metaphorically.

"We have, without question, lost more of our culture, more of our language - 99 percent," Wallace said. "We have no ceremonials. When we assimilated into the white man's world, we assimilated into the white man's world."

The loss of unity with the other Shawnees left the Eastern Shawnee afloat in a different culture without an anchor. By the 1870s, there were but 69 people enrolled in the tribe.

"Many of us can go no further back than our greatgrandfathers to know names, to know where they were born, where they died, when they died, if they were buried and where they were buried," Wallace said.

Today, it has close to 3,000 citizens.

According to the tribe's website, the Eastern Shawnee own approximately 1,000 acres, and the tribe has more than 600 employees working among tribal enterprises that include a travel center, a restaurant and two casinos - the Bordertown Outpost Casino in Wyandotte and the new $85 million Indigo Sky Casino that opened last week near West Seneca.

As the tribe works to regain economic autonomy, it continues its search for its heritage. Wallace said the Eastern Shawnee have rediscovered their language in classes and learned some ceremonial traditions from members of the other Shawnee tribes. Youth and adults are actively involved.

A few years ago, the tribe came in contact with the Newark Earthworks Center. The Shawnee were eager to visit the ancestors' lands, and the center researchers wanted to know the tribe's perspective of the earthworks.

"There's no doubt (that) every part of our work is enriched by communication with the historic tribes of Ohio," said Marti L. Chaatsmith, the center's associate director.

There are no federally-recognized tribes based in Ohio today. The center wants input from tribes with historic ties to the state about how to best and properly preserve the sites, many of which are ceremonial in nature. There is also the matter of artifacts found in the area.

"The more we have a connection with the historic tribes, the more we feel that, when listening to what they want, we feel we're following the right path to caring and preserving the earthworks," Chaatsmith, Comanche and Choctaw,

In recent years, the Eastern Shawnee have brought two busloads of tribal citizens to Ohio to take in the homeland experience, but for the July trip, a small delegation brought a new experience to the Newark community and Ohio Historical Society. The youth performed several powwow, social and stomp dances for an audience. It was a vital reminder to the Newark residents of their state's indigenous past, Chaatsmith said.

The summer program was part of a National Endowment for Humanities-funded project called the Ancient Ohio Trail (www.ancientohiotrail.org). The Newark earthworks site is a stop on Ohio's map of heritage tourism.

"It was a wonderful exchange, a wonderful experience,"

Plans are in the works to bus another group of tribal citizens to visit Newark next summer.

'Wellness court' aims at addiction

TOM ROBERTSON Minnesota Public Radio

CASS LAKE, Minn. (AP) -Fred Isham sits near a blazing fire just outside Cass Lake on the Leech Lake Indian Reservation. The 37-yearold tribal member helped you come back out there it's a rebirth. You're clean again," said Isham, who is a member of the Boise Forte Band of Ojibwe but grew up here.

Isham was a chronic drinker and pot smoker. Last summer he got his second DWI citation, and he later violated Initially, that part of the program kept him on track. Later, his own success drove him, he said.

"They're really on you all

It gave the tribe a direct say in the outcome of cases involving band members.

The Leech Lake tribe has a lot at stake. By some estimates, as many as 60 percent of the reservation's tribal residents struggle with drug and alcohol addictions. It's a problem that touches nearly every family.

In Cass County, Ojibwe people make up about 12 percent of the population, but they typically account for close to half of the county jail population. They're over-represented in the state corrections system, too, and they're more likely to reoffend and get sent back to prison.

Korey Wahwassuck is an associate judge for the Leech Lake Band. In wellness court, she shares the bench with her counterparts from Itasca and Cass counties. Wahwassuck says the program is a way to heal people rather than lock them up.

"Nothing else has worked," Wahwassuck said. "We've had people that go back through the revolving door and have repeat offenses, and nothing ever really breaks that cycle of addiction."

Wellness court encourages family members and others to come to court and get directly involved in the process. The wellness team has helped participants find jobs and housing. It's even helped reunite families. Wahwassuck says that broad approach is the only way to slow down the revolving prison door.

"We hear from so many of our participants that maybe a spouse or a significant other got sober with them. Then that affects their children and really has a way to start breaking that cycle of addiction in people's lives," she said.

Because of limited resources, wellness court is capped at 25 participants at a time. In the past six years, 61 people have gone through the program in Cass County. About half have successfully graduated. And among the graduates, only two have reoffended.

Cass County District Court Judge John Smith, who helped establish the court, says the numbers show far better results than traditional probation programs.

"I think they're phenomenal, almost miraculous," Smith said. "The recidivism rate is under 10 percent, which, for chronic alcohol offenders, is absolutely miraculous to me. I think it's probably the best thing I've done as a judge, and most rewarding, in the sense that, we really get the feeling that we're helping people."

The court doesn't deal only with tribal members. About half of its participants are non-Indian.

Thirty-one-year-old Mike Rowell of rural Pine River wears a cross around his neck and a T-shirt that says "Celebrate Recovery." He's been involved in wellness court since 2010, when he got his fourth DWI. He's been in and out of treatment 12 times. Rowell says it was either spend the next three years behind bars, or get sober for good.

"The way I put it, there's a noose around your neck and you're standing on a bucket, and if you don't conform, they're going to kick the bucket out from under you," Rowell said. "That's how it is when you start the program. That's how you feel. That's not how it is. They actually care."

Rowell is set to graduate from the court in November. It has given him the tools he needs to lead a better life, he said. He goes to AA up to four times a week, attends church functions and speaks once a month at his treatment group. Rowell says his life now revolves around sobriety.

"I am into this," Rowell said. "This is my life. Because I tell you what, my life before and my life now, you wouldn't see a smile on my face before. I was a pretty rugged dude, I was. And I've embraced the program. I live it, I walk it, I breathe it."

the effectiveness of alternative justice programs like wellness court is currently underway. The study is expected to be completed next year.

Inside the sweat lodge, Isham and others will pray and conduct spiritual Ojibwe ceremonies.

Isham participates in the Cass County-Leech Lake tribal "wellness court." He's encouraged to use ceremonies and other cultural activities as part of his recovery from alcohol and drug addiction. The court is a unique partnership among the Leech Lake Band of Ojibwe and Cass and Itasca counties in northern Minnesota, Minnesota Public Radio reports. Some Leech Lake tribal leaders were suspicious when asked to help create the wellness court back in 2006. The tribe is sometimes at odds with the state, and band leaders are protective of their sovereignty.

But the tribe came to realize that participating in the program gave tribal judges the chance -- for the first time ever -- to sit in a courtroom with county judges as equals.

Hearing on Kevin Washburn to lead BIA held Friday

■ DOI Secretary, Chickasaw leader, Okla. Rep., others give endorsements

CHICKASAW NATION News Release

WASHINGTON Chickasaw citizen Kevin

Washburn has received wideranging support for his August 2 nomination by President Barack Obama to lead the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

That support continued Sept. 14 during the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs hearing on Washburn's nomination.

Chickasaw Nation Governor Bill Anoatubby expressed his "unqualified support" for the nomination of Washburn during the nomination hearing.

Gov. Anoatubby called Washburn a "shining example of a Native American who has made a lifetime commitment to serve Indian people.

Washburn's "Kevin commitment to Indian country is well-documented," said Gov. Anaotubby. "He has written extensively on federal Indian policy, criminal law in Indian Country, Indian gaming law and other relevant topics. Even more significant is the fact that his scholarship has helped lead to significant advances in Federal Indian policy."

Tom Cole, Representative Oklahoma's Fourth Congressional District, said Washburn's skills, experience and knowledge make him a "superb selection" for the position of Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs.

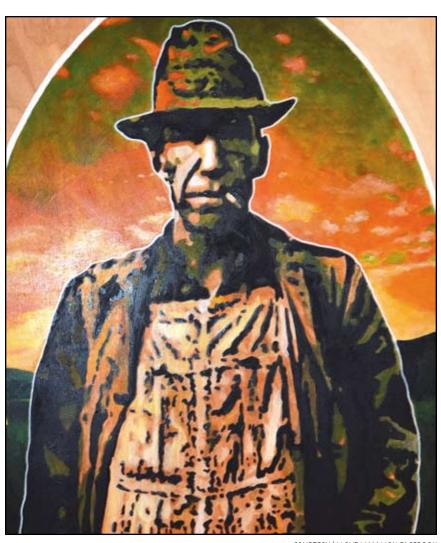

Rep. Cole noted that Washburn understands that tribes exist to improve the lives of their people.

"Kevin doesn't just know

Delaware Tribe considers new management of trust accounts

LENZY KREHBIEL -BURTON Native American Times

BARTLESVILLE, Okla. - The Delaware Tribe is considering changing how its trust fund accounts are managed and

Tribal officials met with citizens twice last week to discuss a proposal that would eliminate the tribe's elected seven-member Trust Board and replace it with a five-member commission that, depending on citizens' feedback, would be either appointed by the Tribal Council or elected by the people.

The current structure was implemented in 1990 via a trust document due to a request from the federal government to withhold the Delawares' accrued trust funds since the tribe was not federally recognized at the time. The tribe lost its federal recognition in 1979, regained it in 1996, lost it again in 2004 and regained it yet again in 2009. Last year, the tribe's members voted to keep the trust funds in a secure, interest-bearing account rather than spend the money, which helped keep tribal programs afloat during attempts at regaining federal recognition.

Pawnee officials announce $600 per-cap payment out of $4.4 million settlement

LENZY KREHBIEL -BURTON Native American Times

PAWNEE, Okla. - Pawnee Nation officials have decided how the tribe will spend a $4.4 million federal settlement.

Officials announced Sept. 10 that $2 million will go to a one-time per capita payment of about $600 for all tribal citizens. The payments will start being processed within 30 days and tribal citizens are asked to update their mailing addresses with the Pawnee Nation by 5 p.m. on Sept.

Tribal officials did not answer questions about whether the per capita payments will have any impact on the annual annuity checks mailed out to tribal citizens.

An additional $2 million will go to tribal programs and services. An oversight committee with three members from the Pawnee Business Council and three members from the Nasharo Council, or Chiefs' Council, will determine which programs will receive settlement funds.

The Pawnee Nation did not provide a timeline for when programs will be selected to receive settlement funds or what criteria will be used to select recipients but did state in a press release that financial reports on how the settlement money is being spent will be published quarterly in the tribe's newsletter.

The remaining money will be used to pay the Native American Rights Fund for representing the Pawnee Nation in the lawsuit. With about 3,500 enrolled citizens, it is the smallest of the 41 tribes that participated in Nez Perce v. Salazar.

The decision on how to spend the money was made Sept. 8 during a joint meeting of the Pawnee Business Council and Nasharo Council that was held in executive session, a move many tribal citizens denounced.

"Living outside of Pawnee, it is frustrating to try and stay in the know about everything from events to ceremonies to any relevant news or information pertinent to tribal members," said Cristi Richardville, a Pawnee Nation citizen from Tulsa, Okla. "If they (the Pawnee Business Council and Nasharo Council) are going to keep part of the money for services, the top priority needs to be improving communication with us (tribal citizens)."

The Pawnee Nation did not respond to questions about why the joint meeting on Sept. 8 was held in executive session or the legal justification for asking nonenrolled citizens to leave an Aug. 25 town hall meeting to discuss how to spend the settlement

Chippewa plan to kill ceremonial elk sparks treaty rights fight

■ This is the first time an elk will be harvested in the state of Wisconsin in modern times.

TODD RICHMOND Associated Press

MADISON, Wis. (AP) -Wisconsin's Chippewa tribes have suddenly announced plans to kill a single elk in the Clam Lake area over the next few days, marking the first time anyone has hunted an elk in the state in decades and sparking a nasty fight over the extent of the tribes' treaty rights.

The Department of Natural Resources has been working since the mid-1990s to reintroduce elk to Wisconsin. The Clam Lake herd is the only one in the state and currently has about 185 animals.

The tribes contend they have the legal right to harvest an elk under treaties they established with the government more than a century ago. DNR officials, though, maintain the treaties require the tribes reach an agreement with the agency on issuing hunting permits. DNR says the Chippewa have never tried to broker a deal on

"We're not happy with them doing this," DNR attorney Quinn Williams said of the elk hunt. "This just came out of left field. It just doesn't bode well for state-tribal consultation and communication."

Erickson,

spokeswoman for the Great Lakes Indian Fish & Wildlife Commission, which represents the 11 Chippewa tribes in Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin, said the DNR has no legal grounds to challenge the hunt and taking a single elk won't hurt the population.

"It's part of the native, natural world and has a part in creating a healthy ecosystem," she said of hunting elk, known as Omashkooz to the tribes. "(The tribes) have been taught if you don't use things, they may be taken from you."

Elk disappeared from Wisconsin in the 19th century due to hunting and shrinking habitat as settlers turned prairies into farmland. The University of Wisconsin-Stevens Point brought the animal back to the state in 1995, setting 25 Michigan elk free near Clam Lake, south of Lake Superior. Over the years, the animals have become a major tourist attraction.

DNR regulations allow hunters to kill 10 elk once population reaches 200 animals. Five of the 10 elk would be reserved for Chippewa hunters. Treaties signed in the early 1800s between the state's six Chippewa tribes and the government grant the tribes the right to 50 percent of the quota for any animal in the territory.

The DNR estimates it could reach the 200-animal hunt threshold by next year and is

Indian child case appealed to the US Supreme Court

CHARLESTON, S.C. (AP) - A ruling that sends a Native American girl back to Oklahoma from her adoptive South Carolina family is being appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The state Supreme Court agreed in July that the 2-year-old should be returned to her biological father, a member of the Cherokee tribe. It was the court's first decision weighing state adoption law against the federal Indian Child Welfare Act.

Washington, D.C., attorney Lisa Blatt has joined the legal team representing the adoptive family from the Charleston area.

The state Supreme Court ruled that federal law gave custodial preference to the girl's father.

A state Family Court judge awarded custody of the child to the biological father last year and she was taken back to Oklahoma.

Haskell sports programs on probation

HEATHER HOLLINGSWORTH Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) Haskell Indian Nations University has taken "corrective actions" to address concerns that led to its athletic programs being placed on probation this last week through 2014, the Kansas school said in a statement released Sept. 13.

The National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics placed the school on probation for "violations involving ineligible players," but it released no details. The probation went into effect Monday.

the university said the problems involved only the football and men's basketball programs, and one player from each team was affected.

He also said the school is still determining how many men's basketball and football games will be forfeited. According to the NAIA handbook, the use of ineligible students leads to the forfeiture of "all contests in which the ineligible student participated." Athletes also lose at least one season of eligibility.

Institutions placed on probation must submit a written response detailing the corrective measures they plan to take. Future violations can lead to the suspension of programs, a move that would bar them from postseason play, according to the

Osage Nation audit reveals $800K in unaccounted for lease funds

LENZY KREHBIEL -BURTON

Native American Times

PAWHUSKA, Okla. - An Osage Nation Congressional audit has revealed more $800,000 in tribal funds allocated to a tribal community are unaccounted

Released Sept. 7, the audit, conducted by the Osage Nation's Office of Fiscal and Performance Review, shows that between October 2008 and July 2012, the Pawhuska Indian Village received $857,025.93 in lease funds from the Osage Nation's casino in Pawhuska. The casino is located on the southeastern corner of the village's property held in trust.

Payment records show that $50,732.37 of that money went to cover utility expenses with the City of Pawhuska for village residents and entities, including more than 40 payments for bills accrued by Joe Don Mashunkashey, chairman of the village's governing five-man board.

The bills were paid with the village's two-party checks, but with the second signature requirement notation marked out and only one signature

The remaining $806,293.56 has not been accounted for based off of the financial records made available for the audit. The Pawhuska Indian Village's governing board declined to participate in the audit, claiming it is only subject to federal law and not those of the Osage Nation in part because it has its own federal identification number.

According to the audit report, federal identification number claimed by the board is not current and does not have any records on file with the Internal Revenue Service. In a letter dated June 21, 2012, the Bureau of Indian Affairs' acting regional director for eastern Oklahoma, Karen Ketcher, wrote that the office does not have any financial records or reports for the Pawhuska Indian Village, prompting a recommendation that either the tribe or the federal government assume oversight over the village board's finances.

"The Osage Nation

Attorney General Office or an appropriate federal entity take control of the current assets and future revenues of the Pawhuska Indian Village Five-Man Board on behalf of the inhabitants of the Pawhuska Indian Village and place it into trust with the treasurer of the Osage Nation," the audit recommends. "The Osage Nation treasurer would then maintain the accounting records of the Pawhuska Village and issue payments upon request, that they are supported by board minutes and signatures of a quorum of board members."

In response to the audit's findings, Mashunkashey resigned his seat on Sept. 7.

In an interview with the Osage News, Osage Nation Attorney General Jeff Jones said the US Attorney's Office has requested information about the village's finances and bank account for a potential federal subpoena.

A representative from the Oklahoma City office of the FederalBureauofInvestigation could not confirm or deny the involvement of the agency's Tulsa, Okla. regional office.

Tribal members cash $10K settlement checks

POLSON, Mont. (AP) -Members of the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes received $10,000 checks - their share of a $1 billion settlement over mismanagement of assets and natural resources held in trust by the federal government for the tribes.

Tribal members lined up outside the tribally owned Eagle Bank in Polson on Wednesday to cash or deposit their checks and talk about what they plan to do with the

"They come out of the bank, and you can see the relief on their faces," Revan Rogers told the Missoulian. "They haven't felt that way in a long time."

Rogers was also gathering signatures on a petition advocating full dispersal of the $150 million settlement, rather than just over half distributed this week.

"I'm getting a white Impala tomorrow," said Barbara Finley, a certified nursing assistant for the tribe. Part of her job is to drive elderly clients to medical appointments and physical therapy, but her sister totaled her pickup truck two months ago, meaning she has been relying on a tribal shuttle system to transport her clients.

"Cars, housing, furniture, savings, child care," she said. "Someone I knew already moved into a new apartment today. There's been concern it's going to be misspent, but I think we're spending our money wisely."

Randy Milliron said he paid off his trailer.

Members of the tribal council are still discussing what to do with the remaining money. Among the options being considered are elder care, education, economic development, language and culture preservation and land acquisition.

In June, Rogers organized a group called People's Voice,

Tribe's bid accepted for sacred land

KRISTI EATON
Associated Press

ROSEBUD, South Dakota (AP) – A Native American tribe said last Monday it has reached a deal to buy land it considers sacred in South Dakota's picturesque Black Hills, ending weeks of worry about possible development on the land.

The owners of nearly 2,000 acres (800 hectares) of pristine grassland prairie have accepted a $9 million bid by the Rosebud Sioux, tribe President Cyril Scott told The Associated Press. The Rosebud Sioux already has paid $900,000 as an earnest deposit; the remaining $8.1 million is due in November.

The land's owners, Leonard and Margaret Reynolds, couldn't immediately be reached for comment. The couple has declined to talk publicly about the matter since mid-August, when their plans to auction off the land went public and prompted outcry from the Great Sioux Nation.

The land plays a key role in the creation story of the tribes, and members feared that new owners would develop the property, which the tribes call Pe' Sla.

The public auction was cancelled just days before it was to take place. The Reynolds invited private parties to bid on the property, including the Rosebud Sioux. The tribe's bid was accepted in late August, Scott said.

"We have come together as a nation," Scott told the AP. "Rosebud is ready to secure this land for our people."

The tribe plans to conduct an environmental assessment to make sure the land doesn't contain any hazardous surprises.

"We don't want to find anything out there that would require major cleanup," said Vernon Schmidt, executive director with the Rosebud Sioux Tribal Land Enterprise, which was established to piece together the tribe's lands.

"We're hopeful about this. We're confident we'll be able to close the deal with this," Schmidt said.

An online campaign to help the tribe buy the land raised nearly $390,000. The campaign ended two weeks ago.

The Rosebud Sioux Tribe is looking to see if it can cover the remaining land cost itself, Schmidt said. If not, the cost could be spread among the roughly 20 tribes that make up the Great Sioux Nation, which was fragmented when Native Americans were pushed to reservations and now spans several states, including Montana, Wyoming, the Dakotas and Minnesota, as well as Canada.

The tribes believe the Sioux people were created from the Black Hills. According to part of their spiritual tradition, Pe' Sla is where the Morning Star fell to Earth, killing seven beings that killed seven women. The Morning Star placed the souls of the women into the night sky as "The Seven Sisters," also known as the Pleiades constellation.

Tribal members hold ceremonies and rituals on the land.

Schmidt said the tribe hopes to eventually get the land into trust status with the federal government.

working on plans to introduce a second herd in Jackson County.

On Thursday, though, GLFIWC abruptly announced it had authorized a ceremonial permit allowing an intertribal hunting party to take a single bull elk between Thursday and Monday.

Erickson declined to say when the hunters would take to the woods or when the tribes would honor the elk.

"These members are considered by the Tribes to be exercising their treatyguaranteed rights," GLIFWC Board of Commissioners Chairman Michael J. Isham Jr. wrote in a letter attached to the permit.

Williams said the DNR has discussed a ceremonial harvest with the Chippewa, but anticipated it would likely take place next year, once an agreement was in place.

Right now, there's no deal, he said, but the DNR won't try to block the hunt in court or cite any tribal elk hunters.

"We'd be in a tough position if we went into court and tried to argue one elk hurt the population," Williams said. "We still take the position this isn't authorized. This is the first time an elk will be harvested in the state of Wisconsin in modern times. It's a big deal. This could have been handled a little bit better with GLIFWC."

James Bolen, executive director of the Cable Area Chamber of Commerce, which promotes elk watching in the Clam Lake area, said the tribes' unilateral approach won't endear them to non-American Indians in the area. People are protective of the elk, he said.

"There's a lot of sorrow and concern every time there's a new (elk) death," Bolen said. "It would be nice if the tribes could better communicate to nontribal members what this is about. It just kind of was sprung on everyone. 'Oh, by the way, we're going to take an elk."

Minority Business Dev. Agency announces $6.6 million investment in Indian Country

■ Money to help create jobs, support businesses - Alaska, Calif., New Mexico, N. Dakota, Oklahoma to receive federal funds

WASHINGTON -The U.S. Department of Commerce announced last week the winners of a grant competition to spur job creation and economic development in states with large American Indian and Alaska Native populations. Approximately $6.6 million in Minority Business Development Agency (MBDA) funds is being invested with local entities to operate new MBDA Business Centers in Anchorage, Alaska; Fresno, California; Santa Fe, New Mexico; Bismarck, North Dakota; and Tulsa, Oklahoma.

"Today's announcement builds upon the Obama administration's commitment to economic growth and job creation in Indian Country," said Acting U.S. Commerce Secretary Rebecca Blank. "The new MBDA Business Centers will provide minority entrepreneurs and businesses with the expertise and tools they need to compete globally and create good paying jobs in

The primary objective of the MBDA Business Centers is to provide strategic business consulting services to minority-owned firms that will result in the creation and retention of jobs for Americans through business growth. This is accomplished by increasing the domestic and global competitiveness of minority-owned firms in accessing contracts, capital and markets.

"Under the leadership of President Obama, MBDA has achieved new heights in serving the minority business community," said MBDA National Director David A. Hinson, "Since 2009, MBDA has facilitated nearly $12 billion in contracts and capital for minorityowned firms and we have expanded our footprint to new locations by streamlining our administrative operations."

The following entities will receive federal funds over a five-year period to operate an MBDA Business Center:

Alaska: Native American Contractors Association, $1,275,000

California: Asian, Inc., $1,500,000

New Mexico: American Indian Chamber of Commerce of New Mexico, $1,275,000

North Dakota: United Tribes Technical College $1,275,000

Oklahoma: Rural Enterprises of Oklahoma, Inc., $1,275,000

Anchorage, Alaska; Fresno, California; and Santa Fe, New Mexico, are new geographic locations for MBDA and were selected to serve the high concentration of American Indian and Alaska Native firms in the area. By expanding the MBDA footprint, more minority-owned firms will have access to MBDA and its portfolio of strategic partners in the public and private

The introduction of these five new MBDA Business Centers completes the Agency's recent effort to phaseout its three distinct business center grant programs and replace them with one consolidated, redesigned MBDA Business Center program, first introduced in 2011. Under the redesigned program, the centers in these locations are expected to address the unique economic challenges and opportunities in Indian Country and Native Alaska while also serving other minority-owned firms in the state and surrounding area. The redesigned MBDA Business Center program also eliminated geographic boundaries so the distinct expertise of these former Native American Business Enterprise Centers can be accessed by minority business owners from anywhere in the

About the Minority Business Development Agency (MBDA)

MBDA, www.mbda.gov [2], an agency within the U.S. Department of Commerce, promotes the growth and global competitiveness of the minority business community, making them better equipped to create jobs, impact local economies, and compete successfully in domestic and global marketplaces. disappearing. Other leaders have withdrawn the money from time to time to support us while we were fighting for our federal recognition - lawyers' fees are expensive - but we've tried to hold to the document and keep going forward."

Several citizens at the Sept. 10 meeting balked at the notion of appointed officials having control over tribal funds.

"I'm really picky about my money and how it's controlled," tribal citizen Christopher Ketchum said. "I think the trust board, trust commission or whoever will be in charge of it should be elected."

An attempt is underway to have the proposed changes on ballot for the tribe's Nov. 3 election. The trust document requires at least 30 days notice that the question will be on the ballot, which places the deadline for a final, publicized version at Oct. 4. However, even if the final draft is ready in time, there is some question as to whether it can legally happen right now.

According to the trust document, the only way it can be amended is either by a two-thirds vote at the annual meeting of the tribe's citizens, a similar majority on a referendum initiated by at least 100 adult voting members of the tribe or the citizens delegating their authority to the Trust Board president. The suggested changes are coming from the Tribal Council.

Chief Paula Pechonick

"The trust document states that such a referendum vote can only be initiated by an initiative petition signed by 100 adult voting members," acting Trust Board chairman Chet Brooks said. "While there are changes that should be made to the trust document and master plan, they cannot be made through this format (proposed by the Tribal Council)."

The tribe's constitution allows for a question to be placed on a ballot upon receipt by the Tribal Council secretary of a petition signed by 100 members of the tribe or the Tribal Council passes a resolution with a two-thirds majority calling for an election. Last amended in 2008, the Delaware Tribe's constitution does not mention the trust board or trust document anywhere in it at this time.

"This is democracy in action," Tribal Council member Nate Young said. "This is what democracy is all about. We want to hear what vou want.

"Whatever decision we make, I want it to be the result of informed input and a decision that the people made."

Newspaper garners Media Award

STAFF REPORTS

TULSA, Okla. - The Native American Times (NAT) was among the award recipients honored during Oklahoma Minority Enterprise Development Week last month.

Lisa Snell, the paper's publisher and editor, was recognized with the Media Award for excellence in media development during OMED's annual banquet Aug. 23, a celebration of success of minority entrepreneurs that was coordinated by the Native American Business Enterprise Center (NABEC) of Rural Enterprises, Inc. of Oklahoma.

Snell took ownership of NAT in 2008 after purchasing the paper from former publishers, Liz Gray and Sheldon Gore. Since that time, she has increased circulation by 80 percent and website traffic by more than 200 percent.

The paper, which is now the third largest printed weekly in Oklahoma, has online traffic (www.nativetimes. com) that rose from roughly 1 million hits/month to an average of 3.7 million/

A long time journalist and graphic designer, Snell graduated from the University of Tulsa with a degree in Communications. Her experience includes work in radio, broadcast and print journalism. Before NAT, she was with the Cherokee Nation's tribal newspaper, the Cherokee Phoenix, where she won her first Native American Journalism Award (NAJA) for her work covering the Tar Creek Superfund site near Miami, Okla. in 2004. Snell left the Phoenix after the birth of her first child in 2006 and soon began freelance work with the Native Times and other publications.

The NAT is currently based out of her home office in Tahlequah, Okla.

The Native Times circulation comes third behind the second-ranked Broken Arrow Ledger and the largest weekly, the Oklahoma City Black Chronicle. Snell said that the award was a surprise and she emphasized that the paper is not only Native owned, but employs contractors who are all citizens of federally recognized tribes to write stories, sell ads and deliver papers.

Other NABEC winners include: Ohopaki General Contracting and Mechanical, Inc. of Heavener, Okla; H & H Consulting Services, Inc. of Tulsa, Okla. for Minority Sub-Contractor Firm of the Year; FSA Technology, LLC., in Ada, Okla. for Minority Global Technology Firm of the year; Chloeta Fire, LLC. of Oklahoma City for Minority Service Firm of the Year; Innovation One of Marietta, Okla. for Minority Manufacturer of the Year; Elohi of Oklahoma City for Rising Star Firm of the Year; Linda Morris, U.S. Army Corps of Engineer, Tulsa District for Advocate of the Year and BancFirst of Oklahoma City for the Access to Capital Award.

Wyoming tribes seek Yellowstone bison from Montana

MATTHEW BROWN Associated Press

BILLINGS, Mont. (AP) -American Indians in Wyoming have petitioned the state of Montana to give their tribes a group of bison from Yellowstone National Park whose fate has been in limbo since they were relocated to Ted Turner's ranch more than two years ago.

The request comes amid a push by Interior Secretary Ken Salazar to find more places suitable for bison on public and tribal lands across the Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer has also sought new habitat for the animals, although that effort has run up against determined opposition from the livestock industry.

Leaders of Wyoming's Northern

Arapaho and Eastern Shoshone tribes said in a resolution signed this week that bison are an important icon that the tribe can help preserve.

They asked the state to transfer an unspecified number of the approximately 170 bison held on Turner's Green Ranch near Bozeman to the Wind River Reservation in western Wyoming.

The tribes also requested help in their effort from Salazar. His office did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Yellowstone has a burgeoning population of more than 4,200 bison that periodically spill into surrounding areas of Montana. Thousands have been captured and sent to slaughter in the past two decades to avoid spreading the disease brucellosis to livestock.

The bison on Turner's ranch were spared when they were put into a government quarantine program for several years to ensure they were disease-free. They had been slated to go to the Wind River Reservation several years ago but ended up on Turner's ranch when the tribes' proposal fell through.

"Our ultimate goal is to have a free-roaming heard to some extent that exists on the reservation," said Jason Baldes, a member of the Eastern Shoshone who said he's been working with government agencies and conservation groups to move the animals onto the reservation.

"There are a lot of things to work out, such as management, once we get the buffalo on the ground," Baldes added.

Bison once numbered in the tens of the millions across the West before overhunting in the late 1800s nearly drove them to extinction. Yellowstone has one of the largest remaining wild populations.

Another group of quarantined animals from the park was moved this year to northeast Montana's Fort Peck Indian Reservation. A lawsuit from ranchers, property rights advocates and others blocked plans to move some of the animals onto a second reservation.

Schweitzer, a Democrat who has championed the cause of bison restoration to the consternation of the cattle industry, has sought to get the Green Ranch bison onto the National Bison Range in Moise.

Salazar in May asked the heads of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, National Park Service and other agencies to "examine the feasibility of the relocation of (Yellowstone) bison to suitable federal or tribal lands."

A representative of a conservation group that has been working with the Wind River tribes said the reservation is the most suitable destination for the animals since some of the groundwork for a relocation already has been accomplished.

But Garrit Voggesser with the National Wildlife Federation said the Green Ranch bison also could be broken up and sent to more than one destination.

"If we just keep taking these steps, ultimately we'll get to the point where we have bison on a much broader landscape," said Voggesser.

Buffalo Bill performer remembered during ceremony

A history buff pieced together the details of Afraid of Hawk's life and his death - he was buried in an unmarked grave in Connecticut. Now, he's home.

KRISTI EATON Associated Press

MANDERSON, South Dakota (AP) - Descendants of a Native American man who died more than a century ago while touring with a western-themed show gathered together last Sunday to honor his life and celebrate his remains coming home to a South Dakota reservation.

About 75 people gathered at a gymnasium on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation to take part in a traditional Lakota funeral for Albert Afraid of Hawk, who died at the age of 20 at a Connecticut hospital in 1900. A ceremony at a nearby cemetery followed Sunday's service.

"He's going to make his journey today after over 100 years," said Lakota medicine man Rick Two Dogs.

Afraid of Hawk died after a bout of food poisoning while traveling with Buffalo Bill's Wild West show and was buried in an unmarked grave in Connecticut. Family members weren't where he was buried until Connecticut history buff Bob Young uncovered records of the Oglala Sioux member's death and burial. A few years ago, Young pieced together the details and reached out to Afraid of Hawk's family members.

Last month, Daniel Afraid of Hawk, Albert Afraid of Hawk's last living nephew, and other relatives traveled to Connecticut from their homes on the Chevenne River Reservation in South Dakota to witness the disinterment of Albert's remains. On Sunday, Daniel celebrated his uncle's life by singing him a song in Lakota before Two Dogs and others performed a traditional smudging ceremony with herbs to bless Afraid of Hawk.

Other people involved in the repatriation of Albert Afraid of Hawk, including Young and his wife, Mary Jo, spoke at the service about the process of bringing the Lakota man back to his tribe.

Young, who worked at the cemetery at the time of the discovery, said he and his wife have gained a new family.

"We love all of you dearly," Young, who is president of the historical society in Danbury, Connecticut, said to the Afraid of Hawk family. "I'd like to say, Albert, you've become like a grandfather to us."

Following the funeral service, Albert Afraid of Hawk's remains, which were wrapped in a buffalo robe, were driven to a nearby cemetery. With the Badlands in the background, Afraid of Hawk was hoisted on to a wooden scaffold to remain until evening. His remains were then to be buried in the ground along with buffalo and cherry juice.

According to Lakota spiritual belief, the journey to the spirit world takes four days. The Lakotas bury food with people to sustain them during that time. Once someone arrives in the spirit world, the food is shared with family members.

Albert Afraid of Hawk was born in 1879, the third of seven children belonging to Emil Afraid of Hawk and his wife, White Mountain. His brother Richard was among the survivors of the Wounded Knee Massacre in 1890. Afraid of Hawk joined Buffalo Bill's Wild West show in 1898 with childhood friend David Bull Bear from the Oglala Sioux Tribe.

Descendants of Bull Bear also attended the Sept. 9 ceremony.

"I'm proud to see him coming home and to rest in peace. I'm thankful to the people that discovered all this," said Lonnie Bull Bear,

Iconic meals mark Coquille tribal tradition

A fire was started in the pit Sept. 7 and burned all throughout the night to ensure the coals were hot enough to give the salmon the alder smoke flavor.

TYLER RICHARDSON
The World

NORTH BEND, Ore. (AP) – Nearly 2,000 pounds of fresh salmon helped feed around 1,800 guests at this year's ninth annual Mill-Luck Salmon Celebration at The Mill Casino-Hotel.

The coals in the bake pit sizzled for hours as a huckleberry reduction sauce dripped from large Chinook salmon and hungry customers waited in long, but quick-moving lines.

The Sept. 8 celebration, which was free to attend and spanned more than two days, gave people hands-on experience with various aspects of Native American culture.

Stations were set up where visitors learned how to basket-weave, make traditional hunting weapons and play different instruments like the Native American flute.

"This has a powwow flavor," said event organizer Vickie Standridge.

"But it is really for guests to come and share the tribal culture and have a fun experience." Canoe races were one of the main attractions as people from various tribes across Oregon and Washington, as well as non-tribal members, raced a mile-long course in West Coaststyle canoes.

Shirod Younkey, from the Miluk and Coquille tribes, shared his passion for canoes with bystanders as he emceed the races.

Younkev said canoes play a vital role in the history of tribes. Not only were they the main form of transportation, but they also taught people how to work together and set aside differences.

"It reminds us of our responsibility to the water and the animals in it," Younkev said of canoes.

"These are the passages of our ancestors. It is another way to affirm ancestral kinship ties."

They also give people a chance to enjoy each other's company.

"It is a fun way to get people on the water, and everyone has a good time doing it," he said.

John McCallum, who made many of the canoes that raced at the event, and who captained a Kalapuya-style canoe, said a lot of pride and time go into to making one.

"It took a few months to make," he said about the canoe he raced. "It is always a great amount of fun."

While many guests learned different aspects of Native American culture, the center of the celebration was the salmon. Chef Chris Foltz, with help from tribal elders, used a "stake method" to cook the 20- to 30-pound fish.

Each salmon, which came from the Columbia River, was sewn back and forth on an alder stick, with the skin and bones left on and in to ensure it wouldn't crumble under the intense heat. The stakes then were put into the ground around the pit, and the salmon slow roasted for about an hour and a half before being served.

A fire was started in the pit Sept. 7 and burned all throughout the night to ensure the coals were hot enough to give the salmon the alder smoke flavor.

Foltz said the deep heat from the pit and salmon fat that dripped in to the coals gave the salmon a flavor and texture that can be found nowhere else.

"It is the best fish anybody will have," he said. "It is amazing."

Foltz said cooking with the pit was great because of the flavors that have accumulated in it over the years and the texture of the dirt.

"There is so much coal and salmon fat in there," he said. "It's an earth

The night of Sept. 8 was capped with live entertainment, and Standridge said the celebration was again a huge success

"It's just getting bigger and bigger every year," Foltz said.

Traditional Cherokee Games are always popular at the Keetoowah Cherokee Celebration. The Blowgun competition, Marbles, and stickball are three of these events; featured in the photo is the Cornstalk Shoot, which draws a large group of contestants year after year. There is also a children's category for the youngsters.

UKB Celebration: 'One Fire, One Family, Rising Together'

MARILYN CRAIG United Keetoowah Band Press Release

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. – The United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians invites the public to attend the 62nd Annual Keetoowah Cherokee Celebration, on Friday, October 5 and Saturday, October 6, 2012. Most events will be held at the Keetoowah Cherokee Celebration Grounds, located at the UKB Complex, just north of West Willis Road at Keetoowah Circle.

A myriad of events will occur during the two day festival, including a gospel singing, the Chief's State of the Nation Address, a kid's fishing derby, a stompdance, Pow Wow, free traditional meal, inflatables for kids, face painting balloon animals, turtle races, make and take crafts, arts and crafts and food vendors, free bingo, volleyball, softball and a parade downtown.

There will also be several traditional games competitions, including a cornstalk shoot, marbles, a blowgun competition, and a stickball game.

The UKB John Hair Cultural Center and Museum will be featuring the Keetoowah History Gallery, which has expanded since last year, as well as "Come and Go" Basic Art Lessons for children and youth. The first session is from 1 p.m. – 2:30 pm. and the second session is from 3 pm to 4:30 p.m.

The museum will also feature a "Vintage Photo Identification" for adults throughout the day. The museum has several photos of Keetoowah from the late 1800s and early 1900s that they need I.D. s on.

A couple of events will be held prior to the Celebration weekend – including the Miss and Miss Keetoowah Pageant, which was held on September 13, 2012 and the Keetoowah Cherokee Golf Tournament, scheduled for September 28 and 29.

The theme for this year's 62nd Annual Keetoowah Cherokee Celebration is One Fire, One Family, Rising Together.

In the history of the United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians in Oklahoma, before the tribe received its federal charter and constitution, the United States Government requested that all ceremonial grounds and communities become as one to form one tribe.

The Keetoowah Society, the Nighthawk Keetoowahs, the Eastern Immigrants, the Western Cherokee, the Medicine Society, the Keetoowah Society Incorporated and the Seven Clans Society, were among the groups that came together.

While there was some overlapping in the membership of those groups, each were in such a struggle to maintain their ethnic and national identity, along with their heritage, they were all working toward federal recognition.

Although some of these groups had applied to be federally recognized, the federal government said they should all come together and be recognized as one tribe. They did this with the corporate charter and constitution as the United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians in Oklahoma. The charter did leave leeway for these subgroups to continue to have their own organizations.

And so these groups became united in the eyes of the federal government, and in many ways, became not only one tribe, but one family.

In keeping with this request, this year's 62nd Keetoowah Cherokee Celebration theme, "One Fire, One Family, Rising Together," continues that common purpose.

"Keetoowah forefathers who loved and lived as free people and had never surrendered to anybody: They loved one another for they were just like one family, just as if they had been raised from one family." - Keetoowah Laws, April 25, 1859

"We shall never give up Keetoowah, and will all join hands and fight until we fall to the ground." – Nighthawk Keetoowah Constitution

With the Federal Government putting Land in Trust for the UKB, and recording it in the Federal Register, there is no doubt the Keetoowah Cherokees will continue rising together.

Upon hearing this historical news, Chief George Wickliffe and Assistant Chief Charles Locust, responded, "This is the greatest news for the United Keetoowah Band since it began its unique history. Everyone involved in making this happen will go down in history as helping the Forgotten Cherokees to rise above all adversity and to insure they as a people continue to fight and provide services to its members. This is our story and our relationship to the Burning Phoenix, whose name and story are symbols for the United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians in Oklahoma."

Keetoowah Cherokee ancestors foretold of the day when the tribe would prevail. Like the Phoenix rising out of the ashes, the Keetoowah Cherokee today is stronger than ever before. And as the UKB moves forward with future endeavors and opportunities, the tribe will remain, "One Fire, One Family, Rising

Residents help Native icon pay her rent

MANDY VALENCIA
Mail Tribune

MEDFORD, Ore. (AP) – On Tuesday, Sept. 11, Agnes Baker Pilgrim turned 88. Grandma Aggie, as many know her, is the oldest living descendant of the Takelma people and serves as a Native American spiritual elder and indigenous stateswoman.

She has been written about or videotaped for countless local stories. It's her likeness, along with an eagle and a bear, in "We Are Here," a 20-foot-tall wooden totem-like sculpture that greets visitors in downtown Ashland.

But while she may be widely known in the region, few know that she struggles to pay her rent and bills each month. So friends and acquaintances have banded together to help her. "We started the Agnes Baker Pilgrim Fund," said Alice DiMicele.

"A group of people in Southern Oregon and other places help to pay Grandma's bills and rent every month, but now her bills and rent have gone up in the last few years, and the amount of people who donate has dwindled because the economy is bad."

As September approached, there were no funds in the account, so DiMicele decided to create a "virtual birthday party" for Baker Pilgrim on Facebook as an event, to try to raise money for the elder for her birthday.

"So many people love her and appreciate the work she does, but a lot of people don't realize she doesn't have a way to pay her bills and rent," said DiMicele, "She's going to be 88, she doesn't need to be worried about paying her rent and bills."

The seventh of nine children, Baker Pilgrim was born on Sept. 11, 1924, in Logsdon, on a tribal allotment near the headwaters of Oregon's Siletz River. According to the biography on her website, www.agnesbakerpilgrim.org, she explored a variety of careers in her lifetime before following a more spiritual path in 1970.

"It's ironic that we are raising rent money for someone while we're occupying her land," said Mary Dodd, a supporter of Baker Pilgrim. "Maybe we should be paying rent to her? It was her land to begin with, in a real way."

In her earlier years she worked as a bouncer at a nightclub, a barber in a jail, a scrub nurse at a hospital, raced stock cars and managed a restaurant, all of which no doubt prepared her for her role as mother of three sons and three daughters, having married three times in her life. She is now the real-life grandmother of 18, great-grandmother of 27 and great-great-grandmother of one.

Baker Pilgrim was not available for comment as she was traveling to Pendleton to give offerings of berries and buffalo meat to prisoners in the state correctional facility there.

"If we can pay her rent for a while, then we can do fundraising to support her projects she wants to do, like the Salmon Ceremony," said DiMicele. "The money that goes into the fund only goes to support her needs like rent and bills, or if she has a health emergency."

After Baker Pilgrim decided to shift her life in the early '70s, she took on the medicine name of her Takelma great-grandmother, "Taowhyee," or Morningstar. From 1974 to 1989 she worked as a manager and counselor at the United Indian Lodge in Crescent City, Calif. There she focused on alcohol-related problems, prevention, intervention and rehabilitation. Baker Pilgrim also dedicated her time to helping children of povertystricken families. In 1985 she graduated from Southern Oregon State College with an degree in psychology and a minor in Native American studies.

"It's not like a charity thing, it's a duty for all of us, not only because of what she teaches but because of what we took," said Dodd. "That's part of the teaching is knowing what we took. It's not something to be defensive about – just wanted to throw that out there as someone with blonde hair and blue eyes."

Donations to the Agnes Baker Pilgrim Fund can made at Rogue Federal Credit Union, or by mail to Agnes Baker Fund, C/O Julie Norman, 596 Helman St., Ashland, or by donating online at www. agnesbakerpilgrim.org.

"I want to send her a list of everyone who donated like a big virtual birthday card," said DiMicele, "Julie and I will make sure she sees everyone's name, but we want her to know that these are beautiful people that support her."

TULSA, Okla. — Signs and comments on an Alabama casino's potential growth consumed most of a Department of Interior listening session on sacred sites Tuesday morning.

The session, the last of seven held across the country, was scheduled in an effort to get feedback for potential policy changes on protecting and preserving sacred sites. Despite the number of tribes headquartered in Oklahoma, the Tulsa location was a late addition to the list of listening sessions. Similar meetings were held earlier this year in Albuquerque, N.M.; Billings, Mont.; Prior Lake, Minn.; Uncasville, Conn.; and Portland, Ore.

"I'm disappointed that this (the Tulsa meeting) was an addition," former Muscogee (Creek) Nation National Council member Cherrah Ridge said. "There are 39 tribes here. Oklahoma should have been one of the first — if not the first — location on the list."

Ridge was one of many Muscogee (Creek) citizens who attended Tuesday's session to voice concerns about a proposed casino expansion by an Alabama tribe. The Muscogee (Creek) Nation has vocally opposed a $246 million casino expansion near Wetumpka, Ala., by the Poarch Band of Creek Indians. The Oklahoma tribe claims the project will desecrate Hickory Ground, the last pre-removal capital of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation National Council and home to ceremonial and burial grounds. To date, more than 60 sets of human remains have been unearthed during the expansion

Judge: SD prison tobacco ban curbs religion rights

DIRK LAMMERS Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) - A federal judge ruled Wednesday that the South Dakota prison system's ban on tobacco in religious ceremonies substantially burdens Native American inmates' religious rights.

Chief Judge Karen Schreier ruled that even if state officials had asserted a compelling governmental interest, they did not prove that the complete ban was the least restrictive means available to further that governmental interest.

Schreiersaidinherrulingthatinmates and officials should meet and propose an appropriate, narrowly tailored injunction, which should include revisions to the tobacco policy for inmates practicing the Lakota religion. TULSA, Okla. - In Volume 1 of "Super Indian" comics, our hero saves his reservation from a culture-crushing giant robot named Techoskin. In an even bigger feat, author Arigon Starr has created an exciting new work as entertaining as it is significant.

The Los Angeles-based entertainer, singer, actor and artist known for her recording career and comedy stage plays has been hard at work since 2007 turning a character created for a 10-minute radio play into an ink-onpage reality. Now in its second printing, "Super Indian" comics is a sleek 64page, full-color volume of heroes, crazy antics and personalities based on the contemporary life of Native American reservation life.

"Sometimes it takes a while to get things going. I mean, that thing took forever. I mean, 2007 is a long time ago," Starr said during a recent visit to Tulsa. "You don't want to just rush it out there."

It was worth the wait.

An enrolled member of the Kickapoo tribe and also of Creek, Cherokee and Seneca descent, Starr grew up in a military family. Her father was a U.S. Navy recruiter, and it meant they moved a lot. During the summers, the family visited relatives in Tulsa. That's when Starr's grandfather took her and her younger sister to buy comic books. When school resumed, she would draw comic book characters in class while listening to lectures.

After finishing high school in San Diego, Calif., she moved to Los Angeles and became a publicist for Showtime television and Viacom Productions. Eventually, she left to work on her own music career and went on to produce several albums, including "Meet the Diva," "Backflip" and "The Red Road." "The Red Road" was an original cast recording of her musical play of the same name about people living on a reservation. In addition to her music, Starr has written plays, such as "The Red Road" and other original pieces on contemporary American Indian life. Her acting has garnered awards from the First Americans in Arts Awards, the Los Angeles Women's Theatre Project and the Wordcraft Circle.

Starr's work is filled with humor, and her latest creation, "Super Indian" follows that line.

The character had its beginnings when the Native Radio Theatre Project and Native Voices at the Autry (a Native American theater program of the Autry National Center in Los Angeles) commissioned a group storytellers of the Wordcraft Circle

NADV helping people escape cycle of abuse

■ Of Native American women murdered, over 75 percent were killed by a family member, an acquaintance, or someone they knew.

DANA ATTOCKNIE Native American Times

NORMAN, Okla. The memory of Linda Wahpeconiah-Forrester's sister is helping to save the lives of people hit by domestic violence

"My sister was murdered by her abuser; her longtime companion," Wahpeconiah-Forrester said. "I've always wanted to do something in her memory, but I really wasn't sure"

After looking throughout the Norman, Moore and Noble area she noticed the only domestic violence shelter was at the Women's Resource Center (WRC) in Norman. She also realized the more she heard stories from friends being in or having lived through harmful situations, they didn't know there's a place to go for help. So, this year she founded a non-profit organization called Natives Against Domestic Violence (NADV). NADV is dedicated to helping people escape the violence and to helping the WRC keep its doors open.

"We need a place for our Indian women to go, if they're brave enough to get out," Wahpeconiah-Forrester said. "Love shouldn't hurt. Love shouldn't kill. There is an opportunity for them to come and be safe with their children. They don't have to leave their children; they don't have to leave anything but their abuser."

NADV gets out into the community to seek donations for the WRC. Donations can be monetary, food or personal items. The biggest fundraiser thus far will be a gourd dance from 2 to 10 p.m. Oct 6 at the Goodrich Memorial UMC, located at 200 W. Hayes Street in Norman.

"I love them," Jo Ann Smith, WRC executive director said of NADV. "How could you not love anybody who understands what your struggle is and wants to help you so much?"

The WRC was established in 1975 and continues to provide a domestic violence shelter and rape crisis center despite budget cuts. Women and children are all welcome to find protection at the shelter, and battered men will also be found a place to stay.

"We're against domestic violence, period. It's not right, no matter who does it. Usually men don't need shelter, but they certainly do need somebody to talk to, know what their rights are and know what's available," Smith said. "There are people out there that really care and we at the WRC, for example, have been doing this for a long, long time and they aren't going to tell us anything that is going to shock us. We've heard it all. We want them to be safe, and we want their children to be safe."

Last year the WRC served 190 women and 137 children. They did have to turn away some people who were from out of their county or from out of state, but they did refer them to other shelters.

Smith said there are 28 other domestic violence programs and sexual assault programs in Oklahoma, including tribal programs. She said the WRC has a good working relationship with the tribes in Oklahoma and they help the WRC all the time.

"I would hate to try and do what we do, without them (tribes). They're so important to us. No one can help Native people, like Native people," Smith said

Wahpeconiah-Forrester said NADV also has a great rapport with the tribes and they want to continue building bridges. She said NADV has a board of seven people, all volunteers, and they have asked people involved with other domestic violence organizations to be on their board in order to help "bridge that gap." Wahpeconiah-Forrester and Mary Lou Drywater lead the NADV board

"I'm just hoping we can all work together to help these people get out of these horrible situations," she said. "If I can help that one get into a shelter and feel safe even just for a night, maybe that's the night she won't get murdered, which is what happened to my sister. Or maybe that night she left with her kids, maybe she won't be beaten up in front of her kids. So we just have to take baby steps, because the reality is they do go back to their abusers sometimes. But if for some reason something happens within them, hey this is it; this is the last time this will happen, and they stay and they get to have a new life without violence."

Smith said 32 years ago the majority of the people who went to the WRC were ages 16-25, and they usually had two or three children under the age of 5. That statistic has flipped within the last five years. Now they serve more women between the ages of 40-55, and many of them don't have children.

"In the old days, we would have two-thirds children and one-third women. Well, that has changed too. Now we have two-thirds women and many fewer children. That's because the women that are here, are older," Smith said. "As resources for people have dried up, the people who are most likely to get housing and other services are people who have children. So there are things for them, but women who don't have children with them have fewer resources so we're seeing more of them in the shelter. That's what I think

The average time a person stays at the shelter is 15 days; this includes people who have stayed there three days. One lady stayed there for a year while her court trial was ongoing because her abuser was out on bail. Smith said if they made her leave it would've been like signing her death warrant. They have also had people who have gone there repeatedly whenever situation became dangerous. She said women have a tendency to downplay the abuse and just want to forget how horrible it was so they often go back.

"I don't blame them for that, but it only gets worse. It doesn't get better. It never gets better. It will only get worse...," Smith said, adding that even when an abuser thinks he has the violence under control, he is still capable of killing and she doesn't want that to happen. "I don't know if those are words of wisdom, but they are words of compassion. We don't want to hear that anybody has died when there are shelters out here. We'll put people on the floor, we'll put them on sofas; we'll put them on chairs and use ottomans. We'll do anything to keep somebody alive."

Wahpeconiah-Forrester, a cancer survivor, said people see a lot of breast cancer walks for example but domestic violence is such a "hush-hush" topic that people don't want anyone to find out about; that they get beaten in their own homes in front of their own kids or family.

"This really isn't OK ... This is no way to live," Wahpeconiah-Forrester said. "There's such a smoldering sense that nothing's going to happen. Whenever they're beaten down so much they feel there's just no hope, or their abuser has a huge family or even a predominant family within the tribe. There are many reasons why they suffer in silence. We just want to make them aware they don't have to."

The WRC crisis line number is (405) 701-5540. The number is a 24 hour a day, 365 day a year phone number. Smith said if the only way someone can get to them is by calling at 3 o'clock in the morning, and having them send a cab, then they'll do that. "We'll do what we need to do to get you here. We'll work with you," Smith

Computer and nutrition classes are also provided at the WRC, and they are also able to help with personal care items and food. Their website is www.wrcnorman. com and their Facebook page is http://www.facebook.com/pages/Womens-Resource-Center/160156347337817.

According to the American Indian Health Council, "the frequency of battering in Indian Country is believed to be much higher than the national norm; American Indian women experience the highest rate of violence of any group in the United States; American Indian women stand a high risk of losing their children in instances of physical and sexual abuse; Three-fourths of American Indian women have experienced some type of sexual assault in their lives; Homicide is the third leading cause of death for Native women, and of Native American women murdered, over 75 percent were killed by a family member, an acquaintance, or someone they knew."

For more information about the gourd dance, contact Drywayter at (405) 361-2393 or Wahpeconiah-Forrester at (405) 833-1559. Supper is at 5:30 pm, the public is welcome, and all proceeds will go towards the WRC Domestic Violence Shelter and Rape Crisis Center.

"Love should never hurt. Love doesn't abuse you. Love doesn't leave you with bruises and broken bones. Love does not kill you by instrument or by hand," Wahpeconiah-Forrester said. "You can have a life without violence. Your kids can have a life without seeing you violated or beaten ... please, please get out. There are people that want to help you."

ruling and was not yet ready to comment.

The inmates' attorney, Pamela Bollweg, called the ruling a victory for the First Amendment and for religious freedoms.

"People who enter the prisons don't leave their religious freedoms at the door, and that's what she ruled," Bollweg said Wednesday night.

In their 2009 federal lawsuit against the South Dakota Department of Corrections, inmates Blaine Brings Plenty and Clayton Creek contended that the policy was discriminatory. The state said ceremonial tobacco inside the state penitentiary was becoming increasingly abused, and the policy was not overly restrictive because it allowed other botanicals such as red willow bark to be burned.

The Justice Department, in a brief filed in July, said the state's position ran contrary to the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act and U.S. Supreme Court precedent.

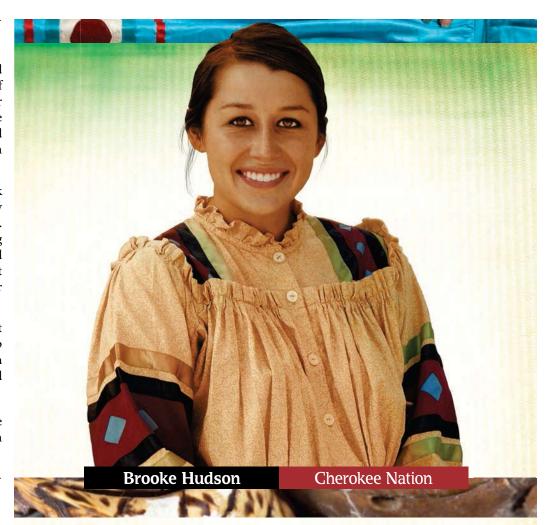

The South Dakota prison system went tobacco-free in 2000 but made an exception for tobacco used in Native American ceremonies. Officials in October 2009 eliminated that exemption, saying tobacco was being sold or bartered and inmates had been caught separating it from their pipe mixtures and prayer ties

Members of prison-based Native American Council of Tribes sued, arguing that for Native American prayer to be effective, it must be embodied in tobacco and offered within a ceremonial framework.

Brings Plenty and Creek in their suit said the policy change violated their U.S. constitutional rights ensuring that no prisoner be penalized or discriminated against for their religious beliefs or practices.

Bollweg said she's confident that the two sides can come up with a policy to address both the prison safety concerns and the inmates' religious rights.

"We know that there are policies out there that can accommodate this," she said.

late Friday.

The vote was applauded by Secretary of the Interior Ken Salazar.

"As we continue to strengthen the integrity of the nation's government-to-government relationship with federally-recognized Indian tribes and empower Native American and Alaska Native communities, Kevin Washburn will be an outstanding addition to our leadership team and a vital asset for President Obama's initiatives in Indian Country," Salazar said in a statement.

Washburn has been UNM law school dean since June 2009. He also worked as a federal prosecutor and has taught at law schools at the University of Arizona and the University of Minnesota.

"Kevin understands the pressing needs of Indian Country, and he brings the experience and enthusiasm needed to meet those challenges, Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., said in a statement Saturday. "The Senate's quick approval of his nomination demonstrates the broad support he has in Washington and around the country."

After his August nomination, Washburn won praise from the president of the National Congress of American Indians, who also is lieutenant governor of the Chickasaw Nation.

"Law enforcement and trust reform will be two of the most important issues for the BIA in the coming years," Jefferson Keel said. "Kevin's experience as a federal prosecutor will be a great benefit."

Washington worked with the tribal group to develop and pass a federal law aimed at combatting crime on reservations, known as the Tribal Law and Order Act. He is known as an expert in federal American Indian law and policy, with a focus on law enforcement, the group said.

Navajo President Ben Shelly said after the nomination that the tribe is looking forward to Washburn's expertise in advancing issues in Indian Country, such as economic development, infrastructure, renewable energy, and improving public safety and education.

Washburn said during his confirmation hearing this week that he would work to ensure the federal government meets its obligations to American Indians and would support those tribes working toward greater self-governance.

Man sentenced in pivotal domestic violence case

DAVE KOLPACK Associated Press

FARGO, N.D. (AP) - A North Dakota man whose case has been cited by the federal government as the legal standard for prosecuting domestic violence cases on American Indian reservations was sentenced Sept. 17 to more than five years in prison.

Roman Cavanaugh Jr., of Fort Totten, pleaded guilty in July to domestic assault by a habitual offender, a charge that allows prosecutors to use previous convictions in tribal courts to bring a case to federal court. The habitual offender statute has been upheld by two federal appeals courts.

Cavanaugh was convicted of domestic abuse offenses in March 2005, April 2005 and January 2008, all in tribal court. The federal charge involves a July 2008 incident in which Cavanaugh was accused of slamming his common-law wife's head against the dashboard of his car and threatening to kill her.

"Because of this statute, Roman Cavanaugh isn't going to be in a position to abuse his wife and kids for a very long time," U.S. Attorney Timothy Purdon, of North Dakota,

A judge in 2009 threw out the habitual offender charge because Cavanaugh did not have legal representation in tribal court. The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the decision in July 2011, and the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals made the same call that month on a separate domestic violence case.

Brendan Johnson, U.S. Attorney in South Dakota, said the Cavanaugh ruling sent a message to other federal prosecutors that they could bring domestic violence cases to court before it's too late for the victims.

"In the past, we've had to wait until the domestic violence reaches the aggravated assault stage, which means that someone has been seriously, seriously injured," Johnson

Cavanaugh's attorney, Alexander Reichert, has not been able to get the U.S. Supreme Court to address whether prosecutors should be allowed to use previous convictions in tribal courts. He said Monday that he believes high court justices are waiting for more arguments at the appeals court level before taking on

"I think the (appeals) ruling is unfair to Native Americans," Reichert said, noting that Cavanaugh didn't have a lawyer in tribal court.

The tribal court system on the Standing Rock reservation, which straddles the North and South Dakota border, is one of the few that provides public defenders. Cavanaugh's tribal prosecutions took place on the Spirit Lake reservation in northeastern North Dakota.

"Our goal is to have functioning tribal court systems like they have in Standing Rock, where people have public defenders," Purdon said. "In the meantime, until we get to the point where all the tribal courts are functioning at that level, we're going to use every tool in our toolbox to protect Native women."

Federal prosecutors in North Dakota have indicted seven cases under the habitual offender statute since the Cavanaugh ruling. South Dakota has indicted 10 cases, including the conviction of former Standing Rock council member Kerby St. John in June.

U.S. District Judge Ralph Erickson on Monday sentenced Cavanaugh to five years and six months in prison, to be added on to another sentence that Cavanaugh is serving for punching his 11- and 12-year-old sons.

Erickson said in court Monday that the habitual offender statute is meant to address an epidemic of domestic violence in Native American communities and called Cavanaugh's charge "a very serious offense from that standpoint."

Justice Department figures show that an American Indian woman born in the United States has a 1-in-3 chance of being sexually assaulted in her lifetime, compared with a 1-in-5 chance for all women born in the Cavanaugh told the judge he takes responsibility for his actions and plans to take parenting classes and go through substance abuse treatment in prison.

"I'm beyond sorry for all the things I've done wrong," Cavanaugh said.

Erickson, who cited Cavanaugh's eight previous convictions in state and tribal courts for assault and 17 arrests for public intoxication, said he was not impressed with a plea agreement that called for less than five years in prison.

"I can't impose that type of sentence with a straight face," the judge said.

South Dakota hospital suing IHS for $6.5 mil

MARTIN, S.D. (AP) - A South Dakota hospital that nearly closed earlier this year because of financial problems is suing the Indian Health Service, saying the federal agency doesn't pay its bills.

The Bennett County Hospital in Martin is trying to collect more than $1.65 million in fees for care provided to members of the Oglala Sioux Tribe.

The Argus Leader newspaper reports that the hospital's demand of $1.65 million represents the difference between the IHS payments the hospital has received and the $2.2 million in care provided to Native American patients since 2007.

The IHS did not immediately respond to the lawsuit. The agency has said in the past that it is not responsible for some bills under its guidelines.

State finds in favor of Mohegans in land dispute

MONTVILLE, Conn. (AP) -Connecticut's Historic Preservation Office says a planned affordable housing complex in Montville would be built on land that has both historical and spiritual significance to the Mohegan Tribe.

The opinion is a victory for the tribe, which has been fighting plans for the 120-unit complex known as The Village.

The office found that the 12-acre property off Route 32 includes the remains of the fort of Sachem Uncas, the tribe's founder.

The state agreed with a previous consultant's report that found the area is eligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places.

Mayor Ronald McDaniel Jr. tells The Day of New London the developers and the tribe will now meet to discuss a compromise plan that could allow the project to go forward.

Spirit Lake rec center posts sex offender photos

The 36 men who look back at Lawrence, who look back at the children as they troop in to play basketball or computer games, are men of the tribe, residents of the reservation. They range in age from 23 to 76, and each has been convicted of a crime, a particularly offensive crime - sexual abuse of a minor, aggravated incest, rape - and required to register as a sex

The health, security and safety of children are at the heart of the ongoing examination of Spirit Lake's child protection system and social services. After assessing the system for several weeks, the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs recently said it would take over social service programs from the tribe.

Questions have been raised about the placing of children in foster care homes where background checks and follow-up home visits weren't done or weren't properly documented. Some tribal members and others, including people whose jobs mandate that they report such things, have alleged that children have been placed in homes where convicted sex offenders live. The FBI, BIA and other authorities may have investigated such situations, but there have been no announced findings

The best-known example regionally is Alfonso Rodriguez Jr., convicted just months after his release from prison of the 2003 rape and killing of University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin. He was sentenced to die and is in a federal prison pending the last of his appeals. The high-profile case led to major changes in how North Dakota and Minnesota handle sex offenders, and the national sex offender website is named in remembrance of Sjodin.

There used to be a display case, similar to the one at the Fort Totten Recreation Center, at the tribal headquarters building, known as the Blue Building. It's a high-traffic place, where tribal members may stop daily for mail, visit with friends or consult with tribal officials.

Judge denies bank closing C&A accounts

■ As per the terms of the bank's motion, if the accounts had been closed, a check for the balance would have been mailed to the address on file with the bank, which is the tribes' complex in Concho, Okla.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

ARAPAHO, Okla. — A request to close out the Cheyenne and Arapaho's accounts with the First Bank and Trust of Clinton, Okla., was denied last Monday morning.

"Granting the bank's request would be tantamount to something I can't legally do: decide which government is the legitimate one," Custer County District Court judge Doug Haught said Sept. 17.

The request to close the account came last month after the bank received conflicting information as to who has signatory authority for the tribes' more than 30 accounts. According to the tribes' account agreement with the bank, the only person with signatory authority is the governor, a position that has been disputed for almost two

As per the terms of the bank's motion, if the accounts had been closed, a check for the balance would have been mailed to the address on file with the bank, which is the tribes' complex in Concho, Okla. Janice Prairie Chief-Boswell's administration is operating out of the complex while the other woman claiming to be governor, Leslie Wandrie-Harjo, and her government, are based out of El Reno, Okla.

Since June 21, the bank accounts have been under the supervision of the Custer County District Court. Officials from either government attempting to withdraw funds must contact the court and the other government in writing before any removals are allowed. To date, no one has filed a request to access the more than $6.4 million in frozen funds.

"At this point, we just want to stop the bleeding and extricate ourselves from the situation," said Scott Meacham, attorney for First Bank and Trust. "We have the right to close it (the accounts) but didn't want to violate the court order, depending on the court's definition of disbursement."

In his argument, Meacham addressed Haught's concerns that mailing a check to the address of record would effectively decide who was the legitimate governor of the Cheyenne and Arapaho tribes.

"They (the check recipient) would only have authority if they can find a bank that will accept the check," Meacham said. "The bearer would have to show proof to that new bank that they are the legitimate authority."

Haught also denied the bank's request to recover attorneys' fees at this time. Although the tribes' bank agreement includes a provision to allow it, Haught cited other pending litigation between the bank and the tribes as justification for deferred action.

According to the Oklahoma Supreme Court Network, the Boswell administration has an appeal pending with the Oklahoma Supreme Court on Haught's June 21 order that placed the tribes' accounts under court supervision.

Excluding the workers at their five western Oklahoma casinos, the Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes employ about 500 people. More than 12,000 people are enrolled in the constitutionally-bound tribes, including about 5,000 who live within the tribes' nine-county jurisdictional

Muscogee (Creek) Nation Social Services Announces Program Changes

OKMULGEE, Okla. - The Muscogee (Creek) Nation Social Services Department will be seeing applicants by appointment only beginning October 1.

The department made the change due to an increase in phone calls, clients and applications received.

The client-based program receives hundreds of calls and client walk-ins each day.

appointment-based system does not include the School Clothing Program or Social Security.

Department officials said walk-ins will no longer be seen, but exceptions will be made for citizens seeking burial assistance or those who have been a victim of a natural disaster such as a fire, flood, tornado, earthquake, etc.

Applicants requesting assistance must call and speak to a caseworker to determine potential eligibility.

If eligible, the applicant must make an appointment to see a caseworker. However, faxes will be accepted in certain cases. Applicants on the General Assistance program will need to call in prior to Oct. 1 to set up an appointment.

Beginning Sept. 26, the Social Services Department will be closed the last Wednesday of each month in order to complete casework. This does not include the School Clothing or Social Security programs.

The mission of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation Social Services Department is to counsel, advocate, and provide referrals for Native American households to meet certain unmet essential needs. Social Services shall provide necessary assistance to eligible Native American households striving to enhance quality of life while promoting selfsufficiency and financial stability. Along with the new mission, goals have been placed and the department is working towards those goals.

Applicants assistance around the Dustin, Weleetka, Wetumka Holdenville areas may visit the Southern Regional Office for assistance with faxing documents to the Okmulgee

For more information, call the Social Services office at 918-549-2445.

"There's one easy solution to this," Muscogee (Creek) Nation citizen Eli Grayson said. "A bulldozer. Just bulldoze the casino, the entertainment venue, the parking garage, all of it. Return it (Hickory Ground) to the way it was."

Grayson was among a dozen Muscogee (Creek) citizens who rallied outside the federal building Tuesday morning prior to the listening session. Several stayed outside the building during the session, holding signs condemning the Poarch Band of Creek Indians and calling for the preservation of Hickory Ground.

The Alabama tribe was not represented at Tuesday's listening session but has issued public statements claiming the proposed expansion site does not overlap the sacred site and would not disturb the rest of the property.

Although comments about Hickory Ground dominated the three-hour listening session, representatives from other Oklahoma tribes also attended to voice their concerns about ongoing and potential protection issues facing their sacred sites and burial grounds.

"We've identified grave sites in a nine-state area," said Ethan Thompson with the Choctaw Nation Historic Preservation Department. "More than 3,000 of our ancestors have been dug up that we know of. It takes a lot out of people to rebury their ancestors."

Cherokee Nation approves $526 million budget, bumps up Head Start funding

The tribal newspaper's budget was reduced. To offset the cut, the Cherokee Phoenix is eliminating free subscriptions.

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. Cherokee Nation Tribal Councilors approved a $526 million operating budget for fiscal year 2013 at the September Tribal Council meeting, pumping an additional $400,000 into the tribe's Head Start program. The new fiscal year begins Oct. 1.

"Providing top-notch early childhood education is a major objective of my administration, and I'm very pleased the council saw fit to approve additional funding to help our youngest Cherokee citizens," said Principal Chief Bill John Baker. "The success of our Cherokee children is vital to the future of our nation, so we owe it to them to provide the best opportunities possible."

The program helps prepare preschoolers who may be from low-income homes for kindergarten, sharing with them the same learning resources their more affluent peers may have access to. Only about 80 percent of Head Start's needs were met each year and many teachers left for higher paying jobs, said Head Start Director Verna Thompson.

"It's great to see the Cherokee Nation really making Head Start a priority once again," Thompson said. "This funding increase will help us better provide for our students and help retain qualified teachers."

To offset the increases to Head Start, the council voted to reduce funding in areas that are already partially self-funded. For example, in an effort to become more selfsufficient, the tribal newspaper will eliminate free subscriptions and begin charging $10 per year. The Cherokee Phoenix will also appeal to businesses to sponsor news racks for distributing newspapers to their patrons. The November issue of the Cherokee Phoenix will be the first under the new policy. Access to online stories remains free.

Overall, the Cherokee Nation's 2013 budget remained consistent with the 2012 budget. The Cherokee Nation budgets conservatively, but can add funding throughout the year if it becomes available.

In other September business, the council approved a $103 million capital improvements budget to fund roads projects, completion of the new veteran's center and renovations for tribal health facilities. They also approved a measure to allow armed security at tribal casinos.

Additionally, Farrell Mackey Prater, a genealogist and researcher at the Will Rogers Library and Betty Barker, with the Adair County Historical Society were also approved to the new Cherokee Nation Registration Committee which will meet monthly with Registrar Linda O'Leary about tribal citizenship of Native Writers to create a 10-minute radio play to be taped in front of an audience at the 2006 National Audio Theatre Festival at Missouri State University-West Plains, Mo. In the absence of Native American comic book heroes, she sketched out the character and story of Super Indian and wrote the script. Following the success of that recording and broadcast, a 10-part "Super Indian" series for radio was commissioned for 2007.

The next Tribal Council meeting is slated for 6 p.m. Oct. 15 at the W.W. Keeler Complex in Tahlequah.

Throughout her music and theater work, Starr continued drawing, during "Super Indian's" radio play development, she started to wonder what her character might look like.

Super Indian is a strapping, handsome young man with dark locks flowing in the wind. He wears a blue leotard with an "S" on his torso and a black belt with the letters "NDN" on the buckle. His sidekicks are the loyal and purple spandex-clad Mega Bear and the brilliant canine scholar Diogi. What truly makes them unique, however, is that these heroes are ultimately ordinary dudes living on the fictitious Leaning Oak Reservation. The bold Super Indian is, in fact named Hubert, a janitor in glasses with braids at the local bingo hall; Mega Bear is General Bear, Hubert's frybread wielding best friend; and Diogi - pronounced deeoh-gee - is a D-O-G for the non-descript rez dog everyone else in the story sees.

When he was little, Hubert went to a birthday party where he ate commodity cheese re-engineered from a lab at the infamous Area 51. Tainted with "rezium," the cheese gave him super strength and abilities. Diogi also ate the cheese, which gave the already clever hound a superior intellect and access to the reservation library.

Together, the three battle villains and shady characters out to wreck or steal the Native culture - tombraiding anthropologists, overzealous hippies, faux Native American flute players. They also contend with attitudes within the tribe that would abandon traditions and ways of living uniquely indigenous for a kind of uncompromising assimilation. As serious as it all sounds, "Super Indian" is a comedy. Where else would you learn that a reservation mullet is also known as a "business in front, party in the back" hair cut?

"You know, some people slam it, but I like that old 'Batman' (TV) series, you know that old Adam West one, because it was funny," Starr said. "I thought that's just a good marriage of all things that I've been doing with the plays and music because there's just this theme of humor running throughout the whole deal. So, I started drawing."

Since she already had the stories and scripts from the radio play series, Starr started drawing out characters. Starr quickly learned she knew nothing about comic book production, so she read books about it and asked comic book creators questions at comic con events. Soon she was drawing, scanning the images onto computer, adding color through a computer program, adding dialogue and text and then throwing it altogether.

"A lot of professionals are willing to give time to help and tell how to ... learn the process," she said.

The first comics appeared as a web comic in April 2011. With the help of editor Janet Miner (Starr's business partner in Wacky Productions), the comic was released frame by frame at the recommendation of other comic artists. When it started to take off, she returned to the comic cons to show her work to other professionals who were impressed with her technique and storytelling.

The "Super Indian" comic book was first printed in May 2012, published by Wacky Productions. The limited run proved to be more limited than they expected. The first volume is now in its second run, available at www. superindiancomics.com and also on Amazon.com.

The comic puts Starr in good company with other Native comic book artists and creators. Together, they are the newly formed Indigenous Narratives Collective, which includes Roy Boney, Beth Aileen Dillon, Spider Moccasin, Jonathan Nelson, Michael Sheyahshe, Ryan Huna Smith, Theo Tso and Marty Two Bulls.

With so much happening on the comic front, Starr continues work on theater and radio projects. No matter the medium of expression music, stage or print - Starr is consistent in her art: It's always contemporary and always funny.

"It's hard to not, when you're writing about us, to get overly serious about it," she said, "... but there's a lot of life out there and to remember that there's life and there's light and humor and laughter, because that's how we survived - to take that path rather than, 'Oh we've been done wrong and people have hurt us.' Yeah, that's true, all these things are true, but artistically you can go at it two different ways. I've always been on the side where we laugh a lot. That makes my life a lot better."

Starr is currently at work on material for Volume 2 of "Super Indian." The comic is also available at superindiancomics.com

Around the Campfire: Misusing culture

DR. DEAN CHAVERS © Copyright 2012

It is amazing to me the numbers of people and the types of people who misuse the word "culture." Anthropologists, who ought to know better, have been misusing it for 125 years. Stop

I first became aware of the misuse when I had a retired couple in one of my classes at Cal State Hayward in 1973. They were both seniors in college, about to be graduated, with degrees in anthropology. He had retired from the military, and both decided to get the degrees they had missed out on when they were young. I thought they were kind of old (they were in their early forties), but today I realize Put me down. You're carrying they were pretty young.

I had designed perhaps the first course ever offered on "The History of Indian Education." In the course, to make sure students understood the concept of culture, I had them to go through a series of exercises to make sure they knew what Indian kids had to go through in European school systems. When we got through, both the husband and the wife told the whole class that they had been through four years of anthropology classes but had never understood what culture was until they took my

Brothertown Nation celebrates history, future

Although the tribe was recently denied federal recognition, they celebrate the opening of a new community center and the safekeeping of tribal records.

SHARON ROZNIK The Reporter, Fond du Lac

FOND DU LAC, Wis. (AP) - For close to a decade Loretta Metoxen, an Oneida Indian, struggled to gain back the tribal history of the Brothertown Nation.

And her work paid off.

The collection, including dozens of letters written by tribal members who served in the Civil War, were on display Sept. 15 at the grand opening of the Brothertown Indian Nation's new community center in Fond du Lac.

The day was marked with ceremony and celebration and reaction to a recent federal ruling that declines to acknowledge the Brothertown Nation as an Indian tribe under federal law.

"Every day I learn more about the people in my community. One of the great things about my Senate office is how it is becoming a living understanding of each of my Senate districts," said State Senator Jessica King, who attended the event.

Hundreds documents, including original court records, photographs and letters dating back to 1795 had been collected by a man named Otto Heller, a farmer, cheese maker and historian who lived in Stockbridge along the shores of Lake Winnebago.

As Loretta tells the story, when Otto Heller passed away the old farmstead along the lake went to his grandson and when his grandson passed away it was given to the grandson's best friend, a man named Jerry.

One day, Jerry was rummaging through the old house, by then neglected and rundown, and he came across a trunk on the enclosed porch filled with yellowed papers.

"He looked inside and there was the history of the Brothertown tribe," Loretta told The Reporter of Fond du Lac. "And he decided he wanted a million dollars for

She explains that although she is Oneida, and lives on the Oneida reservation serving as the tribal historian, its members are intertwined with the Brothertown and Stockbridge-Muncie nations going back at least 200 years.

"We have shared histories and many of the same relatives," she said.

The Brothertown tribe descends from seven separate tribes that lived in the Northeast. They came to Wisconsin, traveling on foot and by boat, in the early 1800s.

"They always say life is a journey. From New England to New York to Wisconsin and beyond we look forward to our future together as a proud nation," said Richard Schadewald, chairman of the Brothertown Nation. He spoke to the large crowd gathered at the community center to celebrate the milestone event.

Loretta said about four years ago, after having all the items appraised, Jerry finally acquiesced and sold the historical collection for $75,000 to the Oneida Nation, because Stockbridge Nation did not have the resources for such an acquisition.

Now the records are in safe keeping with the Oneidas and the Stockbridge tribe continues to make payments on the treasured collection that contains the original treaties between the U.S. Government and the "peace Indian Nation Community Center. keepers" of the tribe. There is also a complete list of war veterans that dates from the Revolutionary War to World War II.

"We will be taking good care of it and putting it in a format that is accessible to researchers," Loretta said.

Jill Watson from the University of Wisconsin Foundation presented the Brothertown Nation with the Samson Occom Legacy Award for encouraging Native Americans to pursue careers in medicine. Occom was a Native American Presbyterian preacher who organized Christians among various Mohegan and Pequot bands in New England and eastern Long Island into the Brothertown Indians.

Tribal Council member

Faith Ottery said the government's decision declining to acknowledge the Brothertown Indian Nation as an Indian tribe under federal law allows the tribe to finally move forward.

"This has been a 32-year process. Now our only course is to go through the political process and petition Congress, so that is where we are now,"

The city of Fond du Lac has a long-standing connection with the Brothertown people, Loretta said. They have worked here for generations and served as civic officers in their own counties and at the state level.

"We are all connected. We are here and we are happy,"

President nominates Osage citizen next Special Trustee

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

WASHINGTON – President Barack Obama nominated Vincent Logan late last Friday to be the next Special Trustee for American Indians.

A citizen of the Osage Nation, Logan is the owner of The Nations Group, LLC, which works with tribes on asset management, investment strategies and financial education. His professional background also includes stints with Merrill Lynch and the Department of Justice's anti-trust division.

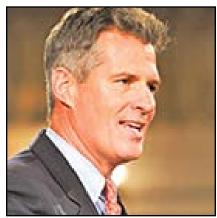

"Vincent Logan has been a part of the fabric of Indian Country for many years as an investment professional, mentor for Native American attorneys and founding member of the Native American Bar Association of Washington, DC," Secretary of Interior Ken Salazar said in a statement. "His asset management expertise, legal experience and extensive network of professional relationships in Indian Country will well serve the Office of Special Trustee as we work to build a stronger and more responsive trust asset management system for the nation's First Americans."

Vincent Logan

The position, which has been vacant since January 2009, works to improve the accountability and management of the $3.7 billion held in trust by the federal government for tribes and Individual Indian Money accounts. The position requires confirmation by the U.S. Senate.

A graduate of Oklahoma State University and the University of Oklahoma College of Law, Logan was appointed to the board of governors for the Oklahoma State University Foundation in 2010. He currently lives in Norman, Okla.

'Tomahawk chop' pops up in Mass. politics

JAY LINDSAY Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – The manager of the Atlanta Braves sees it as a harmless way to fire up his team. A spokesman for the Navajo Nation's president says it's a display of such profound ignorance, it's hard to be offended.

But for rivals in a tight U.S. Senate race in Massachusetts, the "tomahawk chop" is the latest flashpoint in a campaign weighted with questions about which candidate is more credible.

This week, the Democrat-leaning Blue Mass Group posted video online showing staffers from Republican U.S. Sen. Scott Brown's campaign performing the chop, along with war whoops and chants, while standing among supporters of challenger Elizabeth Warren.

CHEYENNE, Wyo. (AP) – A federal judge heard arguments Sept. 28 in a dispute between two tribes that share a reservation in Wyoming: One says their religious beliefs demand that they kill eagles for their annual Sun Dance while the tribe says their religious beliefs demand the birds be protected.

"You're trying to reconcile something which can't be reconciled, aren't you?" said Judge Alan B. Johnson of Cheyenne. He said he will issue a ruling later.

The Northern Arapaho Tribe sued the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service last year over its failure to issue a permit allowing it to kill eagles. The Eastern Shoshone Tribe intervened in the lawsuit saying it has an undivided interest in all the eagles on the Wind River Indian Reservation and wants them alive.

The federal agency this spring issued the Northern Arapaho Tribe the nation's first permit allowing bald eagles to be killed for religious purposes.

However, while the federal permit specified the Northern Arapaho could kill up to two eagles a year, it said they must be killed off the reservation. The state of Wyoming, meanwhile, prohibits anyone from killing eagles off the reservation.

Andy Baldwin, lawyer for the Northern Arapaho, said tribal members' religious beliefs require them to kill eagles for the Sun Dance. ## Untaxed cigarettes behind federal raid on Seneca Nation warehouse

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBANY, NY – Federal agents conducted a raid related to cigarettes on a warehouse on a Seneca Nation reservation in western New York last Wednesday, a witness said.

John Kane, a radio broadcaster on the Cattaraugus reservation, said agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives went through Wolf's Run Trading's building and took owner Will Parry, a tobacco wholesaler, into custody. He said they initially handcuffed several employees but later released them.

The raid, near the center of the reservation, 50 miles south of Buffalo, started late Wednesday morning and was about cigarettes, Kane said.

Parry was in custody Wednesday evening and couldn't be reached for comment. An ATF spokesman had no immediate comment.

The U.S. attorney in Kansas City, Mo., has filed a civil forfeiture complaint for untaxed cigarettes targeting distributors there and identifying 20 people involved including Parry and the owners of three tobacco businesses on the Tonawanda Seneca reservation, 25 miles northeast of Buffalo.

The complaint said that Parry owns a smoke shop on the reservation and that he's not a licensed wholesaler authorized to bring cigarettes into New York.

The ATF in 2009 started an investigation into the illegal sales of contraband cigarettes in the Kansas City area, using undercover agents to sell cigarettes that they tracked, according to the complaint. The ATF noted most states, including New York, require a stamp on cigarettes bought by retailers for resale to the public.

Tribes have challenged in court New York's cigarette taxes as an interference with their sovereign rights.

Linguists' quest to preserve languages in danger

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) – A Utah linguist says dozens of native languages across the Americas could disappear within a few generations with the downsizing of a prominent university program.

The University of Utah recently announced it was closing the Center for American Indian Languages because of shrinking resources and the departure of its founder, Lyle Campbell. The College of Humanities instead will concentrate language-preservation efforts on Utah's tribal tongues.

The narrower mission undermines the university's academic credibility, said Jeff Pynes, a doctoral candidate who was doing research at the native-language center. The class of 2006 Berkeley graduate was drawn to the University of Utah by its reputation for language preservation.

As part of his work, Pynes has made dozens of extended visits with the Tolupan and other indigenous people of Central America, recording their speech and stories in an effort to document their words, syntax and grammar.

Ives Goddard, a senior linguist with the Smithsonian Institution who served on the Utah center's advisory board, said the academic discipline is "not just about rescuing some cute little language."

Rather, "It's learning about human intellectual capacity in general," he told The Salt Lake Tribune. "The goal is to

Agencies boosting access to farm programs in Indian Country

USDA News Release

WASHINGTON - Officials from the Department of Agriculture (USDA) and the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) have signed two memorandums of understanding (MOU) designed to foster improved access to USDA and BIA programs by tribes and tribal members. The memorandums apply to programs administered by the Farm Service Agency, the Natural Resources Conservation Service, Rural Development at USDA, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs at the Department of the Interior (DOI). The MOUs will further improve the important government-to-government relationships and also the services offered between USDA, BIA and the tribal governments and the communities they serve.

"This agreement between USDA and the Bureau of Indian Affairs will help us increase efficiency, reduce redundancy and improve communications and services between our agencies and the tribes," said Under Secretary for Rural Development Dallas Tonsager. "These improvements will help to spur economic development, strengthen the communities and improve the lives of the people of Indian country."

"We look forward to working closely with USDA to serve Country. American Indian farmers are a vital part of Tribal economies and the nation's agricultural industry. Agriculture is the backbone of the nation," BIA Director Mike Black said. "With these MOUs in place, we will be able to work with USDA and its programs as partners in helping American Indian farmers maintain their farms, strengthen the local tribal economies, and bring their produce to market for the benefit of all Americans, and the world."

"This partnership shows the important role tribal lands play in conservation stewardship in America," NRCS Chief Dave White said. "Landowners across the U.S., including those on tribal lands, contribute to cleaner water and air, healthier soil and better homes for wildlife. This memorandum is one effort of many in which NRCS, BIA and Indian landowners and land users can join together to nurture a better landscape."

"The Farm Service Agency is eager to implement this agreement," said FSA Administrator Juan M. Garcia. "We respect and honor the centuries of stewardship that the Indian tribes participating in our conservation and farm programs have shown for the land we all share. We are pleased to solidify our partnership with the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Natural Resources Conservation Service to conserve the soil, care for our water and air, and help the tribe's maximize their agricultural production."

The MOUs set up a framework consultation, training, coordination, and the provision of technical assistance which will increase the amount of Indian land enrolled under USDA conservation and farm loan programs and improve service delivery on those lands. Farming and animal management, grazing, ranching and related food and agricultural operations will be supported through improved interdepartmental coordination. The MOUs, which are in place for five years, also support establishment of Native rural businesses, renewable energy development, and job creation. Additionally, the BIA will work with Rural Development to increase homeownership, home repair, and rehabilitation opportunities, and improve energy efficiency of homes on Indian lands through improved coordination of program delivery. Finally, the MOUs will complement the USDA's Rural Utilities Service (RUS) work with BIA to implement and administer the Substantially Underserved Trust Areas (SUTA) provision of the 2008 Farm Bill to increase affordability and availability of Indian lands. The MOUs also help further the objectives of the Keepseagle settlement agreement, which resolved a lawsuit regarding past discrimination by USDA against

RUS-supported infrastructure on Native American farmers and ranchers concerning its farm loan

Since taking office, President Obama's Administration has taken historic steps to improve the lives of rural Americans, put people back to work and build thriving economies in rural communities. From proposing the American Jobs Act to establishing the firstever White House Rural Council the President is committed to a smarter use of existing Federal resources to foster sustainable economic prosperity and ensure the government is a strong partner businesses, entrepreneurs and working families in rural communities. The Rural Council is working to break down silos of information and to find areas for better collaboration and improved in administering flexibility government programs and to work closer with local tribal and nontribal governments, non-profits and private companies to leverage federal support to enhance the services offered to rural beneficiaries. The MOUs are also an important step in implementing the administration's Administrative Flexibility Initiative in Indian Country, that has as its goal to provide greater efficiency and more effective program delivery to Indian Country across the federal government.

Judge grants stay in Okla. water suit

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

OKLAHOMA CITY - A federal judge has granted another stay in a water rights suit involving two Oklahoma tribes.

Sept. 26, US District Judge Lee West allowed a joint motion from the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations for a third 60-day stay in a lawsuit filed last year against the Oklahoma Water Rights Board and the Oklahoma City Water Utility Trust.

Last week's decision prevents any action from being taken on the suit until Citing the 1830 Treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations are seeking a permanent injunction preventing a proposed water transfer from Sardis Lake to Oklahoma City unless the transaction is either negotiated with the tribes or courtordered. The injunction would also be extended to proposed transfers to Texas and any future transfers outside of the tribe's jurisdiction. Sardis Lake is a federal reservoir in Pushmataha and Latimer counties in southeastern Oklahoma. It is within the Choctaw Nation's jurisdiction.

In addition to Sardis Lake, the Kiamichi Basin, Clear Boggy Basin and Atoka Lake are also specifically listed in the lawsuit. Oklahoma City has been receiving water from those locations for several years without the tribes' approval.

Oklahoma City receives about half of its water supply from lakes and reservoirs within the Chickasaw and Choctaw Nations.

Sanford, USD unite to study Native American health issues

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) - Sanford Research and the University of South Dakota are embarking on a $13.5 million, five-year study examining Native American health issues.

The first $1.5 million in funding comes from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services to create a collaborative research center headquartered in Sioux Falls.

In each of the remaining years, $3 million is expected to be allocated for research.

U.S. Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota calls the planned research a "major development" for Indian Country. He says the area's reservations face unique health challenges and that such investments will improve Native Americans' lives.

OKLAHOMA CITY - Despite pressure from above and below, proponents for universal overthe-counter access to Plan B, an emergency contraceptive, at Indian Health Services' facilities are not yet seeing any substantive changes.

A September survey of 63 IHS pharmacies in the Oklahoma City, Albuquerque, Aberdeen, S.D., and Bemidiji, Minn., service areas by the Native American Women's Health Education Resource Center showed that almost half carried Plan B, but did not have it available over-thecounter, despite the Food and Drug Administration eliminating the prescription requirement in 2006 for women younger than 18.

Among the pharmacies surveyed, only four had a version of the emergency contraception available as a true over the counter medication, not requiring a doctor's appointment or prescription. Forty-three percent did not carry any form of emergency

Earlier this year, the center published a report on the availability of Plan B at IHS facilities that gained international attention and launched an online petition through change. org that has received more than 110,000 signatures.

"I've heard women ask for information about emergency contraceptives so they can talk to their daughters about what to do when they are sexually assaulted, not if they are sexually assaulted," said Charon Asetoyer, founder and executive director of the NAWHRC wrote.

Citing the rates of sexual assault, teen pregnancy and health insurance coverage in Indian Country, the National Congress of American Indians passed a resolution at its mid-year conference in June, calling on IHS to provide over-the-counter access to Plan B for women who are 17 years old or older at all of its service units.

"We keep hearing 'It's coming, it's coming, it's rolled out,' and then we talk to pharmacists," Kingfisher said. "Communication between the service units and headquarters is simply broken."

In an effort to maintain pressure at the grassroots, the center hosted a roundtable discussion Sept. 26 in Oklahoma City with women from the Native communities. In addition forward progress, the group plotted out the September survey results on an Oklahoma map, with different clinic service areas shaded different colors, depending on the Plan B access available. One of the four survey respondents that provided over-the-counter access - the clinic in Pawhuska, Okla. - is in the Oklahoma City service area.

"IHS is our primary health care provider and they need to step up and take care of women," Kingfisher said. "The statistics are simply appalling."

Micah Roundstone smells a sage bundle while Linwood Tall Bull, a retired Northern Cheyenne ethnobotanist, teaches students about medicinal purposes of plants at Washington Elementary last week.

Children learn about plants' ties to tribe

ZACH BENOIT The Billings Gazette

BILLINGS, Mont. (AP) – Linwood Tall Bull looked across Washington Elementary's courtyard on a recent Monday afternoon at the several dozen children seated in front of him and told them that, from the right perspective, they're a lot like the plants around them.

"Every plant has a story," he said. "Every plant is unique. There are no two plants that are alike, just like you."

A retired Northern Cheyenne ethnobotanist, Tall Bull studies the connections between people and plants, specifically in relation to his tribe. He spoke to students about those connections with the Northern Cheyenne, including how they've been used for medical, spiritual.

religious and nutritional purposes over thousands of years.

As classes came in and out of the open-air courtyard for the day, Tall Bull told them about how American Indians used plants in everyday life – specific plants were used as remedies for everything from cuts to coughs; how they've been used as spiritual protection; and how people

He asked the kids if they've ever been mad at their parents and ran into the backyard, climbed a tree, and said you're never coming down until dinner?

nner:
"You always run to the tree

Did you ever notice when you climb back down, you're never angry? Contact with trees takes the pain and hurt away," he said.

The kids, for the most part, sat enthralled by Tall Bull's presentation, which included plenty of real samples of items such as dried roots, sage and patties made of dried and crushed berries.

Myrcle Ortiz, 7, said she'll remember most how water ties everything together.

"He gave the plants water, just like we need water to grow," she said.

But she also took home a chance encounter with a family member she'd never met. After hearing Tall Bull's last name, she asked if he knew her dad, who has the same last name, and it turned out the two are first cousins.

vo are first cousins. "I learned that he's been in my family, and I didn't know that," she said. "I'm going to tell my dad that I met his cousin!"

Draven Scray, 8, said he liked learning about how the Northern Cheyenne would use local plants for remedies and cures.

"I don't know a lot of stuff like that," he said. "Like how they can make tea with the berries for when you're sick. It was all pretty new to me."

Principal Karen Ziegler said the presentation was part of an overall effort to educate kids on American Indian cultures and traditions. It's especially helpful since many of her students at Washington have native ancestry, but might not know much about it.

"The kids have been just fascinated," she said. "A lot of them just aren't exposed to the culture as much, so it's good.

And I think there's a nature deficit in kids, just not being outside enough."

During a short break between speaking with classes, Tall Bull talked about ethnobotany and its ability to share and shed light on the stories of different people, passed down over thousands of years.

Teaching the kids about his tribe's use of local plants, and its beliefs in how they work, is a way to pass on lessons to youngsters that have been handed down for generations.

"I want them to start seeing beauty," Tall Bull said. "I want them to use their five senses and discover what's around them. I'm trying to teach them to respect plants and each other and take some pride."

Tribe and a member of the tribe, countered that her tribe has an interest in every eagle and every other animal on the reservation. "The Shoshone Tribe has a relationship where we honor and protect the eagle," she said. "We don't kill it."

Varilek said her tribe has made unsuccessful overtures to the Northern Arapaho to discuss the issue. "They've been shunned," she said.

Baldwin also said it's not acceptable for the federal agency to pass responsibility to the state government by leaving it up to the Northern Arapaho to seek permission from the State of Wyoming to take a bird off the reservation.

"Fish and Wildlife has essentially endorsed the religious objections of the Eastern Shoshone Tribe as more weighty than the free exercise (of religion) rights of the plaintiffs," Baldwin said.

Johnson noted that the law prohibiting taking eagles has been on the books for years. He asked Baldwin what the Northern Arapaho Tribe has done in the past to get eagles.

"I think outside of any authority, eagles have been taken on occasion," Baldwin

The federal government in recent years prosecuted Winslow Friday, a young Northern Arapaho man, who killed an eagle on the reservation without a permit. Friday ultimately was sentenced to pay a fine in tribal court.

Coby Howell, lawyer for the federal government, emphasized that the Northern Arapaho Tribe did receive an eagle permit, even though it restricts where the birds could be killed.

Howell said the Fish and Wildlife Service had to address a unique circumstance in crafting the nation's first permit to kill bald eagles for religious purposes while accommodating Eastern Shoshone opposition to killing the birds.

Howell said the federal agency would be willing to amend the permit to include allowing the Northern Arapaho to take eagles in other states and would work with the tribe if it wanted to ask the state of Wyoming for a state permit valid off the reservation.

Native American mascots challenged in Washington

DONNA GORDON BLANKINSHIP Associated Press

SEATTLE (AP) – The state Board of Education is making another attempt at encouraging Washington schools to replace their Native American mascots.

In the past decade, about 10 schools have given up their Indian mascots. But another 50, including tribal schools, are holding fast to their nicknames as warriors, braves, redskins and red devils.

The state board passed a resolution last Wednesday urging districts to stop using Native American mascots, but as board spokesman Aaron Wyatt acknowledges, it does not have the authority to mandate this change.

There are no consequences for schools that do not voluntarily choose a new mascot, Wyatt said Friday.

Oregon's state Board of Education voted in May to ban Native American mascots, nicknames and logos. Schools in that state have five years to comply. Eight Oregon high schools are affected.

Washington's resolution, which is similar to resolution passed by the board in 1993, was inspired by research by the American Psychological Association citing the adverse effects of Native American mascots on students.

The resolution also mentions the widening achievement gap between Native American and other students and the call by a number of national organizations and tribes for this change.

"We are in the business of educating students," Board member Bernal Baca said in a statement. "We need to remove any barrier that will impede student success."

Marcus Morgan, superintendent of the Reardan-Edwall School District near Spokane, said the issued hadn't been raised during his tenure with the school district but was open to the idea of discussing All of Reardan's sports teams are the Indians and about a quarter of the district population are Native American or Alaskan Native students.

"I think it's maybe time to ask the questions," Morgan said Friday.

He said he would probably make some calls to tribal leaders as well as the school board and other community leaders to see if this is an issue the community wants to tackle.

Reardan schools have a long tradition of Native American students, as well as having enthusiastic sports fans, Morgan said. He doesn't think the Indian mascot has been seen as derogatory, but he added that the issue deserved more research.

Other Washington communities have had acrimonious battles over retiring a Native American mascot, including some districts close to Reardan. The Colville Indians asked the Colville High School Indians to find a new name in 1997, but they're still the Indians today.

Ten schools have changed their names in the past decade, including Eatonville Middle School, which went from the Warriors to the Eagles; Eisenhower Middle School in Everett, which went from the Warriors to the Patriots and Issaquah High School, which changed from the Indians to the Eagles.

About 10 tribal schools or those on Washington reservations also have Native American mascots, but the majority of schools in the state with Indian mascots are part of their community's long-standing history.

NCAA agreement allows some UND Sioux logos to stay

A state law requiring the school to keep the moniker was repealed eight months after it took effect in 2011, after the NCAA refused to budge on sanctions.

DAVE KOLPACK
Associated Press

FARGO, N.D. (AP) – Thousands of logos depicting an American Indian warrior will remain inside the University of North Dakota's hockey and basketball arenas under a reworked agreement announced Wednesday by the NCAA and the state's attorney general.

The agreement comes in a decades-old controversy that has included lawsuits, legislation, NCAA threats and a statewide vote about whether the school's Fighting Sioux nickname and Indian-head logo were insensitive to local tribes.

The state Board of Higher Education had ordered the school this summer to drop the nickname and moniker to abide by a 2007 agreement with the NCAA. But that plan called for all Sioux logos to be removed from the two arenas, which have thousands of the logos – including on brass medallions on chairs and a 10-foot sketch in the hockey arena's granite floor.

The new plan allows that imagery to stay, though six signs that say "Home of the Fighting Sioux" must be removed so the school will be in NCAA compliance and able to host post-season sporting events at its Grand Forks campus, Attorney General Wayne Stenehjem said. The logo also won't be replaced when it wears out in carpeting.

"I am very pleased that the NCAA was willing to show flexibility in its policy," Stenehjem said, adding that the overwhelming statewide vote against retaining the nickname and the expense of removing the logos were key factors in the negotiations.

University President Robert Kelley also praised the agreement, calling it "a good resolution."

It also allows the school to create a commemorative wall within the athletic complex depicting the history of the Sioux Nation and its contributions to the state.

"The agreement by Ralph Engelstad Arena to reduce the nickname and Native American mascot imagery, and to place the imagery in an historic context, is consistent with the NCAA policy for the University of North Dakota to host NCAA championship events at that site," the NCAA said in a statement.

Arena manager Jody Hodgson said he needed to discuss the new plan with his board of directors, saying they were encouraged but "we're still kind of soaking it in and considering what the implications are."

The hockey arena is named after alumnus and former goaltender Ralph Engelstad, a property developer and casino owner who donated $100 million to finance the 400,000-square-foot arena. Before his death in 2002, he'd told state higher education board he would withdraw his support if the nickname were changed. The arena opened in October 2001, and the Betty Engelstad Sioux Center, named for his wife, opened in 2004.

The debate over the Fighting Sioux nickname heated up in 2005, when the NCAA listed 19 schools with American Indian nicknames, logos and mascots it deemed to be "hostile and abusive."

"hostile and abusive."

The NCAA allowed some schools to keep such nicknames provided they received tribal support. But in the University of North Dakota's case, the Spirit Lake Sioux tribe endorsed using the nickname and logo, but The Standing Rock Sioux's tribal council didn't. The university sued the NCAA, which eventually led to the settlement agreement.

A state law requiring the school to keep the moniker was repealed eight months after it took effect in 2011, after the NCAA refused to budge on sanctions. Then ardent nickname supporters gathered enough signatures to put the issue on the June 2012 ballot, but two-thirds of voters said the nickname should go.

The Legislature has determined that a new nickname cannot be chosen for three years.

"We are pleased to bring this matter to closure," said Ham Shirvani, who recently took over as chancellor of the North Dakota university system.

The chairman of the Standing Rock tribal council didn't return an after-hours phone message seeking comment Wednesday.

American Indian ancestry, and Brown has used that to question her trustworthiness and whether the Harvard professor used her claim for gain in the hyper-diversity-conscious academic world.

But after the video surfaced, Brown was on the defensive, and the chop was in the spotlight.

Warren said she was appalled, and the principal chief of Cherokee Nation called it "offensive and downright racist." Others had more tempered reactions. Erny Zah, spokesman for the president's office of the Navajo Nation, said, "The ignorance is just so blatantly obvious, it's not really worth getting upset about."

Even so, he added, it's a clear mockery of Indian culture.

"Whether they're trying to make fun of a political candidate ... or they're rooting for their sports team, it's based in ignorance," Zah said.

The tomahawk chop is a rhythmic up-and-down motion made in time with a "war chant." Florida State University takes credit for inventing the cheer, though it doesn't call it the tomahawk chop, which is a term associated with the Braves.

Back in the mid-1980s, the Seminole football boosters asked a student spirit group, then called the Scalphunters, to create a cheer to compete with the University of Florida's two-armed "Gator chomp," said Florida State alum Tom Desjardin.

Desjardin, a Scalphunter, said that, for lack of a better idea, they debuted the chop at a 1984 pep rally he was leading. Florida State boosters say the famous chant was added later, on a suggestion from a student from Natick High School in Massachusetts, where the chant was used to support the school's Redmen, a nickname since changed to the Red Hawks.

The chop really took off in a game at Auburn in 1985, when the Seminole band rolled out an intimidating drum beat and trumpet music to accompany it, said Desjardin, now a historian for the state of Maine.

Desjardin said the chop's violent imagery wasn't lost on the Scalphunters, but it wasn't what drove its creation. A main consideration was the fact it was a shoulder-up motion that could be seen in a crowd, he said.

Desjardin added there's a deep respect at Florida State for the Seminole tribe, which the school consults closely on all uses of tribal imagery and which in 2005 granted the school permission to use its

"If the tribe had ever said, 'We don't like that (the chop), you would have never seen it again," Desjardin said

Instead, the chop spread to Atlanta. That city's Seminole Booster Club claims credit for starting it all when some members used it at a Braves game to catch the attention of outfielder Deion Sanders, an FSU alum who began playing for Atlanta in 1991

When the Braves made the World Series that year against Minnesota, American Indian groups protested in Minneapolis and Atlanta, saying the cheer perpetuated racist stereotypes of Native Americans as war-obsessed savages. Some called out Braves owner Ted Turner and his wife at the time, Jane Fonda, for doing the chon

But former President Jimmy Carter defended it, saying it was a way to note that the team was emulating the courage of American Indians.

The cheer outlasted the furor, and in the two decades since has popped up in other places, to little controversy.

"I find it as encouraging to the Braves or the Seminoles," said Braves manager Fredi Gonzalez, who also managed in Miami. "Even on the other side. I was never offended by that"

"It's (the fans') way of making the stadium loud and making it hard on the opposition," said Braves reserve Eric Hinske. "It gets us jacked up."

The Brown-Warren dustup has some people reconsidering the chop, but reactions to it will vary radically among American Indians, said Steven Denson, a member of Chickasaw Nation. He noted there are more than 500 tribes in the United States that speak their own language, and members are bound to view things differently.

For instance, "tomahawk" isn't a Chickasaw word, so Denson wasn't bothered when he watched Brown's people doing the chop. But their mock chants and war whoops got to him. Authentic American Indian chants are often complex and freighted with tribal history, and Brown's people didn't respect that, he said.

"When I read about it, I thought, 'Ah, politics.' When I watched it, I started to get a little angry," said Denson, director of diversity at Southern Methodist University's Cox School of Business. Whether Warren has Indian blood or doesn't, he said, "you respect the culture."

"I think there's a lot of ignorance and a lot of stupidity, when it comes to Indian country," Denson said.

COMMENTARY

Notes from Indian Country: Mascots, Ignorance & Racism

TIM GIAGO (Nanwica Kciji) © 2012 Unity South Dakota

Twenty years ago I was on the Oprah Winfrey Show with Michael Haney and Suzanne Harjo to talk about the use of Native Americans as mascots for America's fun and games.

It was the first time in television history that a major talk show allowed Native Americans to openly discuss why we do not appreciate our use as mascots for sports teams.

I believe that tape is still available through Harpo Productions if anyone wants to see what happened on that show. In the ensuing years no other major network has found the topic interesting enough to pursue. After all, the mascot issue affects only a very small and politically weak segment of the U.S. population and there are those dissenters even among the Indian people who defend this nefarious practice.

Twenty years is a very long time and memories fade. Michael Haney, Seminole, has since made that long journey to the Spirit World. Michael was larger than life. Everyone took notice when he entered a room and his booming laughter made everyone stop, listen and smile. He was large in stature, but even larger in his undying battle against the use of Indians as mascots. He could never grasp the concept that the American people could not see this blatant conduct as racism.

Harjo and several others challenged the legality of the logo of the Washington professional football team, but after several years a judge ruled against them and the one case that might have hit a professional team ownership in the pocketbook, a target that would cause irreparable harm, is gone and probably gone forever.

Twenty five years ago when Native Americans like Haney, Harjo, Charlene Teters, Vernon Bellecourt, Bill Means, Floyd Westerman and I wrote about and spoke out against using Indians as mascots, we were thoroughly and soundly vilified. I was told by a caller on a radio show I did for a Los Angeles station, "What in the hell are you complaining about? We kicked your Indian butts from the east coast to the west coast so why don't you whiners go back to where ever it is you came from."

How does one argue against such redneck stupidity? And speaking of "red" what exactly is a "redskin." When I talked about the Washington professional football team that uses this name as its motto and logo, I started using the "R" word, because I find it disturbingly racist. What is a "redskin?" It is the pigmentation of the skin of an ethnic minority. Americans might use "brownskin" for example when talking about Mexicans or Pakistanis. For years they used "black" to describe people of African descent. Even the Spanish word "Negro" literally meant "black."

When the white Americans were running roughshod over Indian country they chose many colorful names for the indigenous inhabitants. They called the indigenous people redskins, red niggers, prairie niggers, savages, and worse. The name redskin was never intended to be a word to honor Native Americans. It was a word intended to insult and to put the Indian people in their place. The word made a clear distinction between the master race, the white people, and the inferior people, the redskins.

Florida State University has taken this perverse practice to another level in this modern day. The student body and faculty there have taken the honored name of the Seminole people and cut it in half. On their sweat shirts and banners they have renamed the Seminoles, "The Noles." Should that new name be taken as an honor, as some Seminole people claim, or as an insult, which most Native Americans would claim?

It was only after Americans decided that the indigenous people were the "Vanishing Americans," that colleges and high schools began to use names like warriors, braves, Indians and redskins as mascots. Since Native Americans would soon disappear from the face of this earth, the names given to sporting teams were meant to honor a vanishing people. We fooled them and survived.

Pekin High School in Illinois used "Chinks" as their mascot, but when it was pointed out by Asian Americans that the name was racist, they dropped it.

Michael Haney, Floyd Westerman and Vernon Bellecourt, all great Native Americans, went to their graves with no victory in sight for their years of fighting the use of Indians as mascots. Charlene Teters, Suzanne Harjo and I often grow weary carrying on their fight because we have found that it is much more difficult to fight ignorance than racism. In a way, ignorance and racism are one in the same, but until white and black Americans walk one mile in our moccasins, they will never see the difference.

Tim Giago, an Oglala Lakota, was born, raised and educated on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota. He was the founder and first president of the Native American Journalists Association and the founder and publisher of Indian Country Today, the Lakota Times, and the Dakota/Lakota Journal. ## Elder named 'Student of the Year' shares wisdom

Garry Crowe, a member of the Crow Creek Sioux Tribe, is currently living at the Federal Medical Prison Camp in Butner Carolina. He was named G.E.D. Student of the year and was asked to speak at the G.E.D. graduation ceremony. This is a copy of his graduation speech.

Good Day My Relatives:

I would like to start by gratefully acknowledging Ms. Cook-Chavis for encouraging me to take one more test to complete my G.E.D. Also, I would like to thank her for selecting me as G.E.D. Student of the Year. At first, I was reluctant to accept this honor. However, after going back to my housing unit, I thought and prayed about it and realized that it was an honor for me as well as an opportunity for me to pass on to the youth of my tribe the important information that I will be talking about today. With the honor of being named the Student of the Year comes with it the responsibility of making this graduation speech.

Thank you again, Ms. Chavis, for both opportunities.

I am a member of the Great Sioux Nation, which is made up of seven tribes who live along the banks of the Missouri River in central South Dakota. I am 71-years old, and Elder of the Crow Creek Sioux Tribe. The Tribe's name was taken from my great-great grandfather, Alfred Crow. One of the greatest honors and responsibilities of a Sioux Elder in our culture is the passing-on of our wisdom to our children and encouraging our youth to be the very best they can be. As a Sioux Elder, I now know how very important it is to get a high school diploma and/or a G.E.D. diploma.

Like so many other elderly members of the Great Sioux Nation, I am an example of the generation that quit school in order to support my family. Thousands of other members of the various tribes did the same thing. It seemed like the right thing to do at the time. Back in the 1940's and 1950's an eighth grade education was sufficient, as long as you could read and write. Later in the 1950's and 1960's it became painfully obvious that a high school diploma was required to get and hold a decent job. With this necessary increase in educational requirements, the G.E.D. program was instigated to help us all catch up on the necessary understanding to continue to support our families.

Now, with the way science and information technology has affected our lives, it is not unrealistic to grasp the idea that in the years ahead a member of my tribe will need anywhere from two to four years of post- high school (college or technical college) education just to earn what I earned without a high school education in the 1940's and 1950's. As your tribal Elder, hear the words from my lips. Do not expect to earn a decent living for your current or future family without a high school diploma and at least two years of post-high school education. There simply will be no future for you without this very valuable

As your tribal elder also hear this and please, please learn from what I am about to say to you. There is no future for you in either using and especially abusing alcohol and/or drugs in your life. I was finally able to break the cycle of alcohol abuse in my life in the early 1990's. It was not only a struggle of monumental proportion, the alcohol abuse cost me thousands of dollars and several wonderful relationships before I realized that it had to stop. Within a few years thereafter I started to use and abuse marijuana. By the mid-2000's I was selling small amounts of marijuana which resulted in a federal conviction for selling this substance. For some reason it almost seemed as though I had the right to use and sell marijuana. I didn't. This type of thinking was a terrible mistake and a personal weakness.

By 2008 I had been caught a second time selling marijuana (two (2) ounces of marijuana and a second conviction) and I was sentenced to five-years in a Federal Penal Institution. I am sorry for my past. However, as your Elder, I must try and guide you past the failings of my life. Stay in school. Get both a high school diploma and some form of higher degree from either a college or technical college. Please, please, please, stay away from both alcohol and drugs. Both of these substances will lead you to more pain than you should have to bear.

So I say to you, as an Elder, I am getting my G.E.D. today to help set a positive example for other member of my tribe. As your Elder, a job which will continue until the last day of my life, I beg you to do better than I did. Stay in school. Stay away from alcohol and drugs. Finally, I pray that you will know that the kingdom of your God is within yourself and all around you. You have the right to be happy, healthy, and successful in your life. Make it happen for yourself.

Thank you.

Some families optimistic about life at Spirit Lake

Community members say there is much more to Spirit Lake than stories of failure and portraits of despair.

CHUCK HAGA Grand Forks Herald

DEVILS LAKE, N.D. (AP) - Paul Matheny's sons are talkers like their father, the affable general manager of the Spirit Lake Resort and Casino.

Ask Paul Jr., 15, a question about life on the Spirit Lake Reservation and settle in for a discourse delivered with confidence and intensity. Make eye contact with Victor, 7, and it's as if you've handed the boy a microphone. He is what Regis Philbin must have been like as a child.

Paul Sr.'s daughters, Edna, 13, and Estreya, 8, are quieter. One imagines them saying, "Well, someone in this family has to be."

But they all seem happy, welladjusted and playful, with many friends on and off the reservation and an optimistic outlook on life. They are comfortable with their parents.

They are not afraid. And, Paul Sr. insists, they are not alone in that.

Lost in all the recent warnings and negative reports coming out of Spirit Lake, Matheny says, is another reality: Not every family there is dysfunctional, not every child at perilous risk.

"We are a strong family," he said, as his wife, Gricelda, and the children gathered around him in their Devils Lake home. "And there are a lot of people out there who are like us."

After a long stretch of public turmoil at Spirit Lake, the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs has decided to reassert direct authority over the tribe's social services, including foster care and child protection. The tribe ran those programs with BIA funding since 2001. The BIA will take over Monday.

"You hear about it when you go to a meeting in Minneapolis," Matheny said. "Someone says, 'You're from Spirit Lake? Is it really that bad there?'

"No, it isn't."

He doesn't dismiss all criticism of the child protection system or deny the nagging social problems: alcoholism, teen suicide, drugs, poor housing, unemployment and, fueling it all, a grinding poverty.

But there is much more to Spirit Lake, he says, than stories of failure and portraits of despair.

"I was raised out there," he said. "My father and mother were always there for me. I remember growing up and wanting to leave. I left, but I came back, and now I don't want to ever leave.

"I love the place."

Matheny, 43, is relatively prosperous, of course, as manager of the casino, which employs 423 people, more than three-quarters of whom are tribal members. A dozen or so are members of other tribes.

His start in the Indian gaming business was not so promising.

Matheny was born in San Diego, where his mother, an enrolled member of the Spirit Lake tribe, had relocated. His father is from Alabama and not Indian.

The family returned to Spirit Lake in the late 1970s. After graduating from high school, Paul Sr. "went to work in the tribal casino - before the casinos were legal."

He was working craps tables, "making more in tips one night a week" than many adults took home in a full week, when the casino was raided by authorities.

"I was handcuffed, finger-printed and told I was going to jail for the rest of my life," he said, smiling about it

It was a temporary setback. In that primitive operation, Matheny said he learned about slots and gaming tables and casino security. In 1997, he was offered a casino job in the Dominican Republic, and soon he was managing the place.

Next came consulting jobs with First Nations casinos in Canada. In 2000, Spirit Lake asked him to evaluate the gaming floor at its casino. It had opened four years earlier but wasn't making the money the tribe had anticipated. He offered suggestions, and the tribe offered him a job.

While there has always been dispute within the tribe over how to use gaming revenues, "It's been a very good thing for the tribe," Matheny said. "In my generation, it took us from most people having nothing... to a better life for many, including newer vehicles, insurance, paying the light bill."

In the Dominican Republic, Matheny had met and married Gricelda, and in 1999 he brought her to Spirit Lake. Since 2005, they have lived in a house in Devils Lake.

"Available tribal housing is basically Devils Lake now," he said. "It's really hard to buy anything out there," because of a long-standing housing shortage and rules governing the purchase of Indian trust land.

Gricelda had worked as a blackjack dealer at the casino. She now works in housekeeping at a Devils Lake motel. Paul Jr., attends Devils Lake High School, while the younger children attend elementary and middle schools near their home.

While racism and racist behavior have not disappeared, things are changing in Devils Lake, too, Matheny

"When I was growing up, Indian and white here was like black and white in the old South," he said, and he tells of seeing a sign on a downtown store wall: "No Indians or dogs allowed."

"But in the tribe and in town, we don't see it now," he said.

This is his home, he says, surveying the solidly middle-class neighborhood from his yard, filling with children even as he speaks.

"Everyone on this block is my friend," he said.

The home is often overrun by a rainbow of neighborhood kids, especially as Halloween approaches. Each year for the past six years, Matheny has built a "Nightmare on Third Street" display that consumes much of the sprawling yard. It has become a local favorite.

Paul Jr., his son by a previous relationship, helps with the haunted house. He also spends time on the reservation, as do the younger kids.

"In the winter, our grandmother takes us out and we play with our sleds on the ice," Estreya said.

"It's a lot of fun if you have an imagination," Paul Jr. said of the reservation, a place of hills and fields, woods and lakes but few of the more typical diversions and gathering places for young people, such as movie theaters, malls and cafes. "We play in the woods and by the water," he said. "I have quite a few friends there, and we like to go four-wheeling. I built a boat with my grandpa.

"I grew up there until I was 7 or 8 years old. It teaches you a lot of lessons - how to hunt and fish, how to fend for yourself in the wild. You can't depend on video games all the

"I think it's a safe place, too. I've never been scared. There are negatives, but there are positives and negatives everywhere. I plan to live there after college, maybe opening my own auto body shop."

His father is strict and not overwhelmingly so, he said. He sets standards and expects the children to meet them. When he spends time with his mother, who holds joint custody, he gains appreciation for her German heritage.

"He's a great kid," said Kris Wishinsky, Paul Jr.'s mother, who lives in Gardner, N.D. "He's had his hiccups, like we've all had. But he loves his dad and he loves his mom."

She and Matheny "were young" when they were together, she said, and while they had their disagreements and went their separate ways, she speaks well of him as a father. "He's a good dad, a good provider," she said. "He's there for his kids."

A former case worker herself in the tribe's beleaguered social services department, she also shares Matheny's concern that the drumbeat of negative news coming out of Spirit Lake may leave an unduly bleak image, within as well as without.

"I encountered a lot of great families who were able to overcome many obstacles," she said.

"What's been happening is heartbreaking to me. But I have a couple girls (from former client families) who are going to college now, girls who never thought that was something they could do. I would hate to see the progress that people have made - I would hate for that to seem as if it never happened."

find the universal hard-wire blueprint for language everyone is born with."

About 40 percent of the world's 7,000 languages are considered endangered. More than half of them will go extinct within a century, experts say.

Experts said there were 280 languages spoken in what became the United States when Europeans began colonizing North America in the 17th century. English, Spanish, French and Portuguese are replacing the languages spoken by many of the Americas' indigenous groups.

Only 151 remain and just 20 are being picked up by children, Campbell's team determined.

The University of Utah's effort has been credited to the late Wick Miller, who started recording Shoshone speakers decades ago and created an archive.

Arriving at the school in 2004, Campbell sought to shape the Center for American Indian Languages into a leading defender of language diversity. He launched an annual international conference, built a partnership with the Smithsonian and secured more than $3 million in federal grants.

However, the center has largely been left to languish with few graduate students showing an interest in languages.

"I was working so hard, my health was suffering," said Campbell. At age 68, he left in 2010 for Hawaii. Two weeks later, Pynes arrived to discover the scholar he hoped to have as a mentor was already gone.

Campbell had trouble gaining faculty support for building up the language center, Humanities Dean Robert Newman said.

"The fact that he wasn't persuasive to the majority is something that sometimes happens in faculty governance," Newan said.

Actor Johnny Depp honored guest at Comanche Nation Fair

DANA ATTOCKNIE Native American Times

LAWTON, Okla. – Anticipation and excitement is exploding throughout the Comanche Nation headquarters near Lawton, Okla. People are snuggled as close to the road as possible waiting for the 21st annual Comanche Nation Fair parade to begin. No one seems to care about the rain. The only forecast they're interested in is when honorary tribal member Johnny Depp is coming.

"The road was lined with hoodies and umbrellas," Regina Brannock, Comanche Nation tribal member, said. "It's sprinkling/drizzling, but no one's spirits or enthusiasm are dampened."

Most Comanche members learned of Depp's visit to the fair late this summer, and Saturday Sept. 29, 2012 couldn't have come sooner.

"Three SUV's came driving by and a rear passenger window was open with an arm out waving – Johnny Depp. No warning, no announcement, just a drive by," Brannock said. "Since we've been waiting so long, they decided to give us a tease to appease us."

Depp cruised through the parade in a black convertible with one arm around Comanche tribal member LaDonna Harris and the other arm waving to the hundreds of people who came to welcome him to Comanche country. Harris adopted Depp on May 16 as an honorary member of the tribe at her home in Albuquerque, N.M. Depp is on location in New Mexico filming his role as Tonto in the upcoming "Lone Ranger" film due out next year.

Parade watchers yelled out "Johnny," and lulu's could be heard from the ladies as Depp served as grand marshal of the parade. He made it a point to speak to the Comanche children after the parade and answer their questions, as well as pose for pictures and sign a few autographs.

"I thought it was really neat. It was just like a really cool thing to go to," Sha Ingram, 15, said. "I think the funniest part was when he quoted something from 'Pirates of the Caribbean' and he did it in his little Jack Sparrow voice."

Ingram waited in line 45 minutes to see Depp. Only children 18 years and younger were allowed in the gym to hear Depp speak. Younger children could be accompanied by one parent. Ingram took the first "Pirates of the Caribbean" movie with her for Depp to sign, but she didn't get that opportunity. She said she wanted to ask him for advice on becoming an actor.

As soon as Depp entered the gym, there was a roar usually heard at the beginning of a rock concert. Yelling, screaming and whistling came more at times from the parents. All the children were seated on the floor, much like a school assembly, and they all raised their hands to ask Depp questions

Depp said his favorite role thus far was Edward Scissorhands, and he enjoyed playing in "Pirates of the Caribbean" because he could go to work and act as goofy as he wanted to. He told the kids they can achieve anything they want with hard work because, "you have warrior spirit in you." One teenage girl asked Depp why he was so sexy, while another attendee asked Depp to autograph his stomach so he could have his name tattooed that afternoon. One little girl asked Depp if he would return to the Comanche Fair next year. He said, "yeah of course."

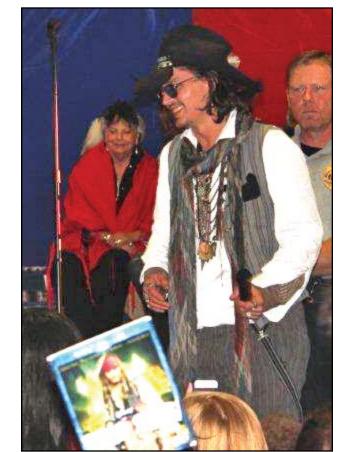

Also speaking was actor Gil Birmingham, who played Billy Black in "The Twilight Series." Birmingham is portraying Red Knee in the upcoming "Lone Ranger" film. "Comanche Boy" George Tahdooahnippah and football player Antonio Perkins were also at the fair.

Depp made time to shake hands, take pictures and lift up little kids to take pictures after he spoke. He also went on a tour of the area and visited the tribe's SIA program where he had lunch. SIA is the tribe's Ethno-Ornithological initiative dedicated preserving Eagles. Depp was then taken to Fort Sill's Commanding General's home for a welcoming ceremony. Comanche Nation Chairman Wallace Coffey told Depp the history of the Comanche people and they visited the gravesites of Comanche Chiefs Ten Bears and Quanah

At Depp's side throughout his visit was his Comanche mom LaDonna Harris, who is the president of Americans for Indian Opportunity.

"LaDonna was with us the whole time. He didn't go anywhere without LaDonna. He loves LaDonna," Asa Attocknie, tribal member, said. "He's very thoughtful. He was shocked the chairman gave him a proclamation making him an honorary Comanche. He didn't expect that at all. He was very humble."

After his private tour of the area, gifts were exchanged with Depp.

"He was very respectful of the chairman and everybody around him. He's a good guy ... He took time to see the kids; give the kids a handshake, I thought that was thoughtful of him." Attocknie said even though the day of Depp's visit was "paparazzi style," Depp remained humble about the parade turnout and continually thanked everyone. He said Depp really wanted to visit the Comanches and was honored he was invited.

Dancing queens: Women making a comeback in the fancy dance arena

■ In the 1950s, young women who had stepped delicately as Southern cloth, buckskin or shawl dancers were suddenly bobbing their heads and hopping low to the ground around the arena floor in feathers and bustles to songs that had once been war dance songs.

KAREN SHADE

TULSA, Okla. – Elizabeth "John-John" Lane is the first person to admit that fancy feather dancing (or just fancy dancing) is a men's powwow event. That didn't stop her, however, from putting on the voluminous bustles and regalia that are its trademarks.

People used to stare when they saw her dressed out and in the arena with other fancy dancers, most of whom were men, she said. When she won a powwow contest, they really talked.

"When a woman beats somebody it's a big thing," Lane said. "I did know a woman who did not care for me dancing. Another person had to get up and tell her, 'You're not going to say nothing.' I'm sure there are some people who didn't like it."

But it mattered little to Lane (Osage/Sac and Fox/Pawnee) and the other girls and women who competed as fancy dancers in regalia either borrowed from a male friend or relative or a hand-me-down from an older brother or cousin.

At one time, there were dozens who became well-known on the circuit.

Jim Anquoe Sr., Kiowa, once listed the names of all the dancers he and others could remember. They came up with 72 women fancy dancers who were actively competing between 1938 to 1960. There were Cheyenne, Arapahoe, Otoe, Pawnee, Muscogee, Caddo, Comanche and Kiowa among them.

"I believe that from 1952 or '53 to 1959, women's fancy feather was at its highest popularity. After that, it slowly started to disappear," said Anquoe, current chairman of Tulsa Indian Club, which hosts the annual Tulsa Powwow.

In the 1950s, young women who had stepped delicately as Southern cloth, buckskin or shawl dancers were suddenly bobbing their heads and hopping low to the ground around the arena floor in feathers and bustles to songs that had once been war dance songs. Lane, who emerged on the scene as a teenager, said it was that made her take it up.

"I just liked it. I enjoyed it," she said. "It just gave me a good feeling to express some good things inside me."

around the arena floor in feathers and bustles to songs that had once been war dance songs. Lane, who emerged on the scene as a teenager, said it was the feeling of the fancy feather dance

Anquoe wrote a short article for the Tulsa Powwow Club about women fancy dancers. In his research, he discovered a photo of a young Ida Laura Jones of Oklahoma City dressed in a boy's fancy feather regalia. As a child, she was called "Babykins."

One of the luckiest things I did was (to) find a picture of her in her outfit in 1938," he said.

Anguoe believes his cousin may

Anquoe believes his cousin may have been the first female fancy feather dancer at age 2.

"Her dad is my dad's brother. When he would sing, she was always dancing around," Anquoe said. "A year later she was moving pretty good, so he fixed her a little fancy dance outfit. She started to dance when he would dress her out. If you see the picture of her I 1938, she looked like a little boy with long thick braids."

thick braids."

As she grew up, Jones and other girls started to dance with the boys and men. He especially took notice during the 1946 American Indian Exposition in Oklahoma, which is still held in Anadarko, where he saw a Muscogee woman dancer in white aprons, white cape, white feather neck bustle and white feathers in a

Names like Georgette "GeeGee" Palmer, Okemah Randle and Pamela Chibitty come to mind to those who remember like Anquoe. So does the name John-John Lane, a Fairfax girl considered one of the best of the women fancy feather dancers.

"When I was young, my aunt and uncle lived in Ocala, Fla., and they worked at a theme park. We danced there for the tourists," Lane said.

It was during one of these summer stays in Florida when she was 12 that Lane, already a cloth dancer, started fancy dancing like her uncle.

"My uncle, he belonged to a brave scout troupe. He taught me and my cousin how to hoop dance. I just like it and continued on, and when I got back (to Fairfax), I just continued on dancing."

Back home, she began competing with her age division in fancy dancing and won or placed high frequently. She actually places better than when she competed as a cloth dancer.

Lane's best competitive years lasted from her time in the junior division up until the mid 1970s, when she had her daughters. In 1980, she gave up fancy dancing.

Female fancy feather dancers had become so popular that a few powwows created a fancy dance category for women, Anquoe said. But much like Lane, many dancers left that arena to focus on raising children and supporting their families

While you may still see girls and women dressed as fancy dancers today, often it is for switch dances in which men and women exchange regalia for fun. Yet, some powwows have kept women's and girls' fancy dancing on the schedule as dance contest specials in honor or in memoriam of someone.

At the 60th Tulsa Powwow this summer, three girls took the arena floor for such a special and quickly won the audience. Charish Toehay, Kiowa and Osage, took first place.

The 19-year-old Oklahoma City Community College student from Anadarko learned to dance in Southern buckskin style from her grandmother, Delores "Dee-Dee" Goodeagle. When she saw powwows were beginning to hold specials for female fancy feather dancing, she borrowed regalia and began to

"I'm a Southern buckskin dancer, and we dance like (we're) walking gracefully. I think it shocked my parents and all that because I like being in different categories. I love also dancing fancy shawl, as well," she said. "It kind of did shock my dad when I first started dancing in the women's fancy feather."

Her dad, Jeffery Toehay of Anadarko, is former fancy feather dance champ himself. He helped her to get all the movements and form down, from keeping the rockers on her head moving to maintaining her

"It's just fun to get in and hop it," Charish Toehay said, with other girls and women in fancy feather dancing. "We all know each other. We all just love to have fun, and we love to talk about it, laugh, giggle and watch videos of (dances). ... We all love hopping it."

For Lane, who put on her bustles last summer again for the first time in decades, the feeling of fancy dancing is unlike any other.

"Whenever our drummers sing these songs, and they make you feel good inside, that's when your best dance comes out of you," Lane said. "... I guess the only way I can ever explain it, is it was from my heart."

Couple appeals ICW custody case to US Supreme Court

CHARLESTON, S.C. (AP) – A South Carolina couple has asked the U.S. Supreme Court to weigh in on a ruling sending their Native American adoptive daughter back to her biological father in Oklahoma under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act.

An attorney for Matt and Melanie Capobianco, in a 142-page petition filed with the high court Oct. 1, said the justices should accept the case to settle uncertainty over how the 1978 act should be interpreted.

"State courts have wrestled openly for decades over the meaning and the operation" of the act, attorney Lisa Blatt

Tribe ponders options in alcohol lawsuit

GRANT SCHULTEAssociated Press

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) – The Oglala Sioux Tribe in South Dakota, whose federal lawsuit against four Nebraska beer sellers and some of the nation's biggest breweries was dismissed this week, may refile the lawsuit in state court, the tribe's attorney said.

Tom White, an Omaha-based attorney for the tribe, said he'll urge the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation's council to continue with its lawsuit against the alcohol manufacturers and distributors, and four retailers in Whiteclay, Neb.

The town of about a dozen residents on the dry reservation's border sold the equivalent of 4.3 million 12-ounce cans of beer last year.

The tribe contends that the Whiteclay businesses have been profiting from rampantalcoholismontheimpoverished reservation, where alcohol is banned. In its lawsuit, the tribe was seeking $500 million in damages to cover the cost of health care, social services and child rehabilitation programs.

The beer companies said none of the tribe's claims were allowed under federal law, and they argued that they can't

BIA likely to run tribe's programs for years

FORT TOTTEN, N.D. (AP) – The federal Bureau of Indian Affairs is likely to manage social service programs for the Spirit Lake tribe in North Dakota for years.

The BIA assumed control of the tribe's social service programs this month after criticism that the tribe has failed to protect vulnerable children. BIA regional director Bruce Loudermilk tells Forum Communications that it likely will take at least a couple of years to strengthen the programs.

Loudermilk says it's up to the tribe to decide whether it wants at some point to seek to regain control of the programs. He says the tribe would have to through a process that includes submitting a formal request.

Loudermilk says the transition to federal control has gone well, though it will take time "to get this all running amounts."

OKMULGEE, Okla. – Voting advocates are reaching across Indian Country where they have never stretched before. Since early 2012, the National Congress of American Indians (NCAI) voting advocacy campaign, Native Vote 2012 and the new campaign, "Every Native Vote Counts," has unleashed an army of voting advocates on the march to turn out the largest number of Indian voters in history.

In every region of Indian Country, organizers are knocking on doors, setting up chairs for rallies, driving elders to registration sites or explaining the issues to those who may not be politically savvy. They are also transporting elders by the vanload in the rural portions of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation to registration sites. Transportation to the polls on Election Day is also in their plans, said Muscogee (Creek) Nation councilor and voting advocate, Cherrah Ridge.

"Our biggest push is to get people to vote, not just to register," she said. "That's where it really counts."

Everywhere is suddenly the place to be to sign up new voters. Audra Antone of the Gila River Indian Community in Arizona has recounted her must-vote speech at basketball games, powwows and state fairs. Any gathering is fair game and she has her pitch pretty well memorized, she said.

"I talk to anyone, anywhere," Antone said. "A lot of Indians don't understand the issues because we go by our own sovereignty."

So, Antone painstakingly explains looming changes in Arizona's education and health care where Natives may be forced to compromise if their voices are not heard, she said. Every day until the Oct. 9 voter registration cutoff in Arizona, it's an extra order of outreach and hold the apathy, she said.

"We (Indians) are invisible in some of these issues. Voting is the easiest thing we can do make our voices heard in Indian Country," Antone said.

Meanwhile, in South Dakota, Alfred Walking Bull and eight other volunteers are attempting to cover the Rosebud Sioux Reservation and its proximity to register Indians to vote. With their reservation near Todd County, South Dakota, their obstacles unexpectedly grew. Overall voting there has declined by some 1,000 voters since the last election, he said.

"We do a lot of rural outreach,"

PINE RIDGE, S.D. (AP) – The Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in southwestern South Dakota has for years attracted journalists and activists eager to tell the stories and share the plight of the Oglala Sioux Tribe.

The allure for journalists, community activists and gawkers is simple: The Connecticut-sized reservation is home to some of the poorest counties in America, one in four children born on the reservation suffers from fetal alcohol syndrome or fetal alcohol spectrum disorder, and the average life expectancy for tribal members is estimated between 45 and 52 years – the shortest in North America except for Haiti.

The statistics on Pine Ridge make for powerful, heartwrenching stories, but some Oglala Sioux tribal members both on and off the reservation think it's exploitative, with too little emphasis on the people who are working every day to try to make a difference.

"For more than 30 years I have greeted reporters from around the world who came to Pine Ridge to do the ultimate story on 'Indians' and I cringe when I see some of the articles after they have been published," said Tim Giago, a tribal member and longtime journalist who has founded several Native American newspapers.

Pawnee govt. mum on final settlement details

PAWNEE, Okla. - A month after announcing a basic spending plan, Pawnee Nation officials still are not disclosing any additional information about how the tribe will spend a $4.4 million federal settlement.

On Sept. 8, members of the tribe's Business Council and Nasharo Council, or Chief's Council, met in executive session and voted on how to spend the tribe's portion of the settlement from the Nez Perce v. Salazar class action lawsuit. The smallest and only Oklahoma-based tribe among the 40 participants, the councils voted to allocate $2 million for a one-time per capita payment to tribal citizens, $2 million for programs and the remaining money to pay the legal fees accrued by the Native American Rights Fund for representing the tribe.

According to the Pawnee Nation's website, checks to each of the tribe's 3,500 enrolled citizens were mailed out Oct. 4. Each citizen will receive about $600.

In the press release announcing the per capita payment, tribal officials said that a six-member Settlement Oversight Committee would be formed to make the final decision on which programs and services will receive the $2 million. Three committee members are supposed to come from the Pawnee Business Council and the other three members will be selected from the Nasharo Council, which is comprised of two chiefs from each of the tribe's four bands. As of Friday, the tribe has not published the names of any committee members or a timeline for their decisions.

The Pawnee Nation communications office did not respond to e-mail and phone call requests for details.

Ottawa Tribe gets $120,000 EPA grant

MIAMI, Okla. (AP) - The Ottawa Tribe of Oklahoma has been awarded a $120,000 grant for its program to control water pollution.

The grant to the Miamibased tribe from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency was announced Wednesday.

The funds will be used to assess surface water quality on tribal lands, compile data which may show changes over time and determine if a more thorough watershed management program needed.

The data will determine whether water quality standards are being met, note any changes in the quality or condition of the tribe's water and provide for planning to improve the health of stream ecosystems.

Peoria Tribe receives EPA grant

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) -The Peoria Tribe of Oklahoma has been awarded more than $112,000 in a federal grant from the Environmental Protection Agency.

$112,099 grant announced Thursday is to provide continued support for the tribe's water pollution control program.

The funds will be used to take water samples to assess surface water quality on tribal lands, compile data which may show changes over time and determine if a more thorough management watershed program is needed.

Sampling data will determine whether water quality standards are being met, note any changes in the quality or condition of the tribe's water and provide planning tools to improve the function and health of stream ecosystems.

The tribe is based in Miami in northeastern Oklahoma.

Man indicted for selling fake Indian jewelry

ALBUOUEROUE, N.M. (AP) - A California man has been indicted for selling fake Indian jewelry in New Mexico.

U.S. Attorney Ken Gonzales in Albuquerque says 59-yearold Andrew Gene Alvarez of Wofford Heights, Calif., has been indicted on a charge of falsely representing that the jewelry he was selling was made by American Indians.

Alvarez pleaded not guilty in an initial court appearance.

According to the indictment Alvarez, was selling the nonauthentic jewelry at the May Native Treasures Show at the Santa Fe Community Convention Center, violation of the federal Indian Arts and Crafts Act. He faces up to five years of in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Native run farm program aimed at reintegrating former inmates

Native Times Special Contributor

TALIHINA, Okla. - At the In a Good Way farm, they can teach you how to be a farmer but they can't teach you how to want to be one. That is something the potential client has to bring along, said Teddi Irwin, executive director of a new non-profit that specializes in reintegrating ex-convicts into society by farming.

"If they don't want to work, they have to go somewhere else," she said. "It's going to take a special kind of person to be able to stay here."

In a Good Way farm introduced its homestead to the nearby community with an open house event Sept. 29. The open house featured demonstrations of environmentally friendly projects like hoop house building; rainwater harvesting; mulching; gardening; bee-keeping; Alpaca rearing; solar energy and other activities. All of the demonstrations are skills that the program plans to teach to program attendees.

The daylong ceremonies were interwoven with various aspects of the Choctaw culture (food, crafts, and arts) because the reintegration program has a Native emphasis. Irwin, a member of the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma, has a son who was incarcerated several years ago and she is hoping to draw released inmates to the 501(c) 3 farm where they hope to instill farming as a vocation.

A former Texas resident, Irwin said that as her son's release date neared, she asked him what he wanted to do to get his life back on track. Although he was a structural engineer, he said he enjoyed gardening time on various work details while in prison. She thought it over before settling on the idea of a work farm as a non-profit. Her son told her that many prospective parolees don't have anything to fall back on when they are released.

"These guys have done things they shouldn't have done," she said. But at In a Good Way Farm, they can make restitution and earn a small wage while learning how to become proficient as a farmer at the on-site residential reintegration program.

Irwin bought the 160-acres of land located within the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma jurisdiction and began research on how to operate a nonprofit. The ball had started rolling. Over several months after purchasing the land, the group developed a farm-based curriculum for members of federally recognized tribes.

Since most released prisoners don't have a college degree and may not have a reliable support system to help them readjust to life outside of prison, here on the acreage, they can hone their skills at becoming self-sufficient in farming, officials said.

The facility accepts Oklahoma Department of Corrections referrals and currently has room for four residents. They plan to expand their room and board capacities depending on the success of the program. In A Good Way farm operates on private donations with no tribal funds or grants at present.

The farm reintegration project has healthy potential. According to the OK DOC statistics, about 2,446 of the state's 26,000 inmates are American Indian. Of that number some 1,743 Indians are on the state's probation program and 142 are on parole.

As far as reintegration programs go, In A Good Way Farm could fill a niche for released Indian prisoners, said DOC officials. But it will take a coordinated effort between the non-profit and the released inmates, said Scott Martinson, DOC clinical services coordinator. At present, the department has too many released offenders to track them by tribal affiliation and lead them to a tribal specific program, like In A Good

"You can lead a horse to water but there is that component of them taking the initiative," Martinson said. "Some of them are not able to."

If an ex-offender finds the Talihina farm program doable, those who stick with the program will learn intensive Farming 101, Irwin said. The site has no TV or internet and limited phone service. Random urinary analyses (UAs) will be run to make sure participants are adhering to program and probation/parole guidelines. Those who don't follow IAGW farm rules will be released, Irwin said.

The theory is to give released prisoners a chance to reinvent themselves as agriculturists. By introducing a new vocation into their lives, the chances of choosing a non-productive lifestyle hopefully recedes. Participants will have individualized training goals with scores and classes as a means to measure the program's success.

"They have to accomplish what they want to accomplish," the executive director said. "It may sound like it's a jail, but it's not. They may even think it as at some point, but it's not."

The facility has begun accepting applications and will begin farming in January 2013.

CUSTODY

wrote.

Blatt wrote the questions the court needs to consider are whether a non-custodial parent can invoke the act to block an adoption initiated by a non-Indian parent under state law. The other issue, she wrote, is whether the act's definition of parent includes an unwed biological father who does not have legal status as a parent under state law.

Different states interpreted the law differently, the petition said.

"These acknowledged divisions - involving over half of the country - lead to intolerable uncertainty in an area of law where certainty is needed most: adoption and custody proceedings that involve children," Blatt wrote.

The Indian Child Welfare

Act was passed because of the high number of Indian children that at the time were being removed from their homes by public and private agencies. The act gives the child's tribe and family the right to have a say in decisions affecting the child.

In July, a split South Carolina Supreme Court cited the act in upholding the return of the Capobiancos' daughter to her father, a member of the Cherokee Tribe. It was the first time South Carolina adoption law was weighed against the federal act.

In the 3-2 decision, the justices said the act confers custodial preference to the child's father.

The child, who turned 3 last month, was adopted by the Capobiancos, who live on James Island just outside Charleston. They attended the girl's birth and cared for her thereafter.

The girl's biological father later sought custody, which he was granted by a South Carolina family court late last year. He arrived in Charleston last New Year's Eve with his parents and took the girl back to Oklahoma. The adoptive parents appealed the family court decision to the state Supreme Court.

In the petition to U.S. Supreme Court, Blatt said the issues go beyond the South Carolina case.

Confusion over the act "spawns litigation that permanently and tragically disrupts established family units" and undermines states' ability to deal with domestic relations issues, she wrote.

"Only this court can resolve two outstanding issues central to the applicability and administration of a federal statute that impacts thousands of custody cases and countless individuals affected by those proceedings," she wrote.

Cherokee Nation road crews discover grave sites

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. (AP) - Officials with the Cherokee Nation say dozens of grave sites were discovered by crews preparing for a road project near Oklahoma Highway 100.

Cherokee Nation Roads Department Director Michael Lynn says crews were working in eastern Cherokee County when they discovered two unmarked stones. Lynn tells the Tahlequah Daily Press that the stones were not disturbed and no dirt has been turned on the project.

Lynn says crews used ground-penetrating radar last week and identified 61 potential grave sites in the same area. He says officials don't yet know whether they are Cherokee, community or animal burial sites.

Lynn says an archaeologist is coordinating with the tribe. He says the Cherokee Nation will continue its work on the Tenkiller School Road Project but that the area won't be disturbed.

Excavation of Creek Indian town planned at Ga. park

S. HEATHER DUNCAN The Telegraph, Macon

MACON, Ga. (AP) - A local archaeologist is planning the first major excavation of Creek Indian towns along the Ocmulgee River since digs at the Ocmulgee National Monument mounds during the Depression. The first of three excavations is slated for a popular park within the Macon city limits.

Macon native Stephen Hammack, who was long employed as an archaeologist at Robins Air Force Base, was accepted this summer into a doctoral program at Oxford University in England, where he plans to research Creek towns along the Ocmulgee between 1680 and 1716. He said he hopes to start next summer in Amerson River Park, formerly Amerson Water Works Park. NewTown Macon, which owns the park, has already signed off on the project.

"We're very excited about it," NewTown CEO Mike Ford said. "We're just hoping the findings will be significant."

Europeans recorded Creek town names but not their exact locations. In most cases the town name referred to the band of people who lived there, so the town moved when the people did, Hammack said. He believes the River Park town might have been one called

"So far, it looks like a huge Creek site," said John McBride of Macon, vice president of the Ocmulgee Archaeological Society. "Just having a Creek town that's really gone undetected for this many years in Macon is a big

Some smaller digs been done during the past several decades at Town Creek when the Macon Water Authority's reservoir and water treatment plant were built and at Brown's Mount.

Hammack said he has not yet received land owner approval for the two other town sites he'd like to excavate. But he said he has spoken with the owner of a site in Butts County that might have been the location of Coweta Town, one of the most important Creek towns.

Although he has not yet approached Macon officials about the idea, Hammack said he also would like to conduct a dig in Central City Park. Hammack believes either Hitchiti or Ochese was the name of the town that was probably located in the area of the oval race track, where joggers still find Creek pottery. Old newspaper articles show that when different features were built at the park, Indian remains were found along with beads, plates and other artifacts. (One skeleton was put on display in a saloon.)

Hammack's research aims to learn more about the layout and size of Creek towns and their trade with each other and with Europeans. He hopes to determine for sure which town was at each site, what cultural group of Creeks lived there and what dialect they spoke.

Some of this information could be revealed by artifacts in the ground, but some may be gleaned from records across the ocean. Ironically, many records from early Colonial America are most likely in England, Hammack said, and he hopes to find some that have never been examined by American historians. Hammack left for Oxford last week.

Ford noted that Hammack's research will increase Macon's exposure in England among people who have probably never heard of the city.

Hammack will be combing the British Archives and the archives of the Association for the Propagation of the Gospel, an Anglican missionary organization that operated widely in Colonial America.

No Creek tribes remain based in Georgia because they were forcibly moved west in the 1800s, mostly to Oklahoma and Alabama. Hammack said he plans to communicate with the modern Creek tribal towns and the Muscogee Creek Nation about his work, and he would like them to be involved.

He also foresees a role for some trained volunteers such as members of the Ocmulgee Archaeological Society. Hammack was secretary of that group for years. Along with other volunteers, members helped collect artifacts from the surface of the ground in the "great meadow" of River Park after a NewTown employee mistakenly harrowed the area several years ago, disturbing the archaeological site.

That incident is one of several that helped Hammack decide to pursue the research.

He and several volunteers took groundpenetrating radar to the park in July to look for underground disturbances that would help target the best areas to dig. The excavation is likely to include only 5 percent of the meadow, Hammack said.

McBride helped with both the surface collection and the radar checks. The surface collection at River Park found more than 2,000 "points" (such as arrowheads) and pieces of pottery, and perhaps and as many as 6,000, McBride said. He is still cataloguing the pieces and grouping them by type. The earliest seem to date to about 1200 A.D., he said.

McBride said he hopes the excavation will locate post holes that indicate where buildings were, which would help researchers estimate the town's population.

Many town sites had been populated off and on for thousands of years. So artifacts must be dated by analyzing their style and patterns and determining the age of surrounding materials such as charcoal, McBride said.

"I will try to draft professional colleagues, because this will be big," Hammack said. Hammack said he also hopes to create opportunities for community members to observe the

The excavations likely will cost $30,000 to $50,000, which Hammack hopes to fund through grants that are available to doctoral students.

NewTown owns any artifacts found at the park but currently has no plan for storing or displaying them, Ford said. Hammack and the Ocmulgee Archaeological Society are holding items found during the surface collections.

NewTown wants to eventually build a visitors center for the park that could display some of the artifacts, but that idea has not yet been funded, Ford said.

"If we were to have a big find, we would have to plan what to do with that," he said. "We will go with whatever Stephen (Hammack) suggests."

A federal judge in Nebraska threw out the case this week, ruling that his court didn't have jurisdiction to address the allegations.

Tribal councilman James "Toby" Big Boy said members knew the lawsuit was a longshot when they approved it last spring. He

"It's time," said Big Boy, chairman of the tribe's law and order committee. "It's time to go ahead and bring this forward. Let the people decide. The feedback I've gotten from a large number of communities is they're ready,

White said the tribe filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court of Nebraska because the claim raised a federal issue, and most cases involving sovereign Indian country are handled at that level.

The lawsuit alleges that the beer makers, distributors and > Federal law bans alcohol sales in Indian country unless the tribal government allows it. The tribe also accused the state of Nebraska of failing to enforce its own alcohol laws.

> Opponents of the ban say lifting it would ease the workload on tribal police, who make thousands of alcoholpossession arrests each year, and generate revenue for the tribe. Big Boy said his proposal would allow the tribe to tax alcohol sales on the reservation and funnel the money into law enforcement, youth programs and other

FACT CHECK: A look at political claims that take shortcuts with the facts or don't tell the full story

CALVIN WOODWARD Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) -President Barack Obama and Republican rival Mitt Romney spun one-sided stories in their first presidential debate, not necessarily bogus, but not the whole truth.

They made some flat-out flubs, too. The rise in health insurance premiums has not been the slowest in 50 years, as Obama stated. Far from it. And there are not 23 million unemployed, as Romney asserted.

Here's a look at some of their claims and how they stack up with the facts:

OBAMA: "I've proposed a specific $4 trillion deficit reduction plan. ... The way we do it is $2.50 for every cut, we ask for $1 in additional revenue."

THE FACTS: In promising $4 trillion, Obama is already banking more than $2 trillion from legislation enacted along with Republicans last year that cut agency operating budgets and capped them for 10 years. He also claims more than $800 billion in war savings that would occur anyway. And he uses creative bookkeeping to hide spending on Medicare reimbursements to doctors. Take those "cuts" away and Obama's $2.50/$1 ratio of spending cuts to tax increases shifts significantly more in the direction of tax increases.

Obama's February budget offered proposals that would cut deficits over the coming decade by $2 trillion instead of $4 trillion. Of that deficit reduction, tax increases accounted for $1.6 trillion. He promises relatively small spending cuts of $597 billion from big federal benefit like Medicare programs and Medicaid. He also proposed higher spending on infrastructure projects

ROMNEY: Obama's health care plan "puts in place an unelected board that's going to tell people ultimately what kind of treatments they can have. I don't like that idea."

THE FACTS: Romney is referring to the Independent Payment Advisory Board, a panel of experts that would have the power to force Medicare cuts if costs rise beyond certain levels and Congress fails to act. But Obama's health care law explicitly prohibits the board from rationing care, shifting costs to retirees, restricting benefits or raising the Medicare eligibility age. So the board doesn't have the power to dictate to doctors what treatments they can prescribe.

Romney seems to be resurrecting the assertion that Obama's law would lead to rationing, made famous by former Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin's widely debunked allegation that it would create "death panels."

The board has yet to be named, and its members would ultimately have to be confirmed by the Senate. Health care inflation has been modest in the last few years, so cuts would be unlikely for most of the rest of this decade.

OBAMA: "Over the last two years, health care premiums have gone up – it's true – but they've gone up slower than any time in the last 50 years. So we're already beginning to see progress. In the meantime, folks out there with insurance, you're already getting a rebate."

THE FACTS: Not so, concerning premiums. Obama is mixing overall health care

CHARLIE NEIBERGALL | ASSOCIATED PRESS

In this Oct. 3, 2012 photo, Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney and President Barack Obama shake hands after the first presidential debate at the University of Denver, in spending, which has been growing at historically low levels, and health insurance premiums, which continued to rise faster than wages and overall economic growth. Premiums for jobbased family coverage have risen by nearly $2,400 since 2009 when Obama took office, according to the nonpartisan Kaiser Family Foundation. In 2011, premiums jumped by 9 percent. This year's 4 percent increase was more manageable, but the price tag for family coverage stands at $15,745, with employees paying more than $4,300 of

When it comes to insurance rebates under Obama's health care law, less than 10 percent of people with private health insurance are benefiting.

More than 160 million Americans under 65 have private insurance through their jobs and by buying their own policies. According to the administration, about 13 million people will benefit from rebates. And nearly twothirds of that number will only be entitled to a share of it, since they are covered under job-based plans where their employer pays most of the premium and will get most of the rebate.

ROMNEY on the failure of Obama's economic policy: "And the proof of that is 23 million people out of work. The proof of that is 1 out of 6 people in poverty. The proof of that is we've gone from 32 million on food stamps to 47 million on food stamps. The proof of that is that 50 percent of college graduates this year can't find work."

THE FACTS: The number of unemployed is 12.5 million, not 23 million. Romney was also counting 8 million people who are working part time but would like a full-time job and 2.6 million who have stopped looking for work, either because they are discouraged or because they are going back to school or for other reasons.

He got the figure closer to right earlier in the debate, leaving out only the parttimers when he said the U.S. has "23 million people out of work or stopped looking for work." But he was wrong in asserting that Obama came into office "facing 23 million people out of work." At the start of Obama's presidency, 12 million were out of work.

His claim that half of college graduates can't find work now also was problematic. A Northeastern University analysis for The Associated Press found that a onefourth of recent graduates were probably unemployed and another quarter were underemployed, which means working in jobs that didn't make full use of their skills or experience.

OBAMA: It's important "that we take some of the money that we're saving as we wind down two wars to rebuild America."

THE FACTS: This oftrepeated claim is based on a fiscal fiction. The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan were paid for mostly with borrowed money, so stopping them doesn't create a new pool of available cash that can be used for something else, like rebuilding America. It just slows down the government's borrowing.

ROMNEY: "At the same time, gasoline prices have doubled under the president. Electric rates are up."

THE FACTS: He's right that the average price has doubled, and a little more, since Obama was sworn in. But presidents have almost no influence on gasoline prices, and certainly not in the near term. Gasoline prices are set on financial exchanges around the world and are based on a host of factors, most importantly the price of crude oil used to make gasoline, the amount of finished gasoline ready to be shipped and the capacity of refiners to make enough to meet market demand.

Retail electricity prices have risen since Obama took office - barely. They've grown by an average of less than 1 percent per year, less than the rate of inflation and slower than the historical growth in electricity prices. The unexpectedly modest rise in electricity prices is because of the plummeting cost of natural gas, which is used to generate electricity.

OBAMA: "Gov. Romney's central economic plan calls for a $5 trillion tax cut - on top of the extension of the Bush tax cuts, that's another trillion dollars - and $2 trillion in additional military spending that the military hasn't asked for. That's $8 trillion. How we pay for that, reduce the deficit, and make the investments that we need to make, without dumping those costs onto middle-class Americans, I think is one of the central questions of this campaign."

THE FACTS: Obama's claim that Romney wants to cut taxes by $5 trillion doesn't add up. Presumably, Obama was talking about the effect of Romney's tax plan over 10 years, which is common in Washington. But Obama's math doesn't take into account Romney's entire plan.

Romney proposes to reduce income tax rates by 20 percent and eliminate the estate tax and the alternative minimum tax. The Tax Policy Center, a Washington research group, says that would reduce federal tax revenues by $465 billion in 2015, which would add up to about $5 trillion over 10

However, Romney says he wants to pay for the tax cuts by reducing or eliminating tax credits, deductions and exemptions. The goal is a simpler tax code that raises the same amount of money as the current system but does it in a more efficient manner.

The knock on Romney's plan, which Obama accurately cited, is that Romney has refused to say which tax breaks he would eliminate to pay for the lower rates.

ROMNEY: "What would I cut from spending? Well, first of all, I will eliminate all programs by this test, if they pass it: Is the program so critical it's worth borrowing money from China to pay for

THE FACTS: China continues to be portrayed by Romney and many other Republicans as the poster child for runaway federal deficits. It's true that China is the largest foreign holder of U.S. debt, but it only represents about an 8 percent stake. And China has recently been decreasing its holdings, according to the Treasury Department. Some two-thirds of the $16 trillion national debt is owed to the federal government, with the largest single stake the Federal Reserve, as well as American investors and the Social Security Trust Fund.

OBAMA: "Independent studies looking at this said the only way to meet Gov. Romney's pledge of not ... adding to the deficit is by middle-class burdening families. The average middleclass family with children would pay about $2,000

THE FACTS: That's just one scenario. Obama's claim relies on a study by the Tax Policy Center, a Washington research group. The study, however, is more nuanced than Obama indicated.

The study concludes it would be impossible for Romney to meet all of his stated goals without shifting some of the tax burden from people who make more than $200,000 to people who make less.

In one scenario, the study says, Romney's proposal could result in a $2,000 tax increase for families who make less than $200,000 and have children.

Romney says his plan wouldn't raise taxes on anyone, and his campaign points to several studies by conservative think tanks that dispute the Tax Policy Center's findings. Most of the conservative studies argue that Romney's tax plan would stimulate economic growth, generating additional tax revenue without shifting any of the tax burden to the middle class. Congress, however, doesn't use those kinds of projections when it estimates the effect of tax legislation.

ROMNEY: "Right now, the CBO says up to 20 million people will lose their insurance as Obamacare goes into effect next year."

THE FACTS: Romney is making selective use of the Congressional Budget Office's March findings on how employers might adjust to the new health law. The neutral Washington scorekeeper actually gave Congress four scenarios - ranging from a net increase in employer-provided coverage for 3 million people to the decrease of 20 million that Romney cited.

Here's why: The law offers tax incentives for companies with more than 50 workers that provide coverage and penalties for those that don't. The analysis says it's difficult to say how companies will behave, with some making a purely economic calculation and others concluding that continuing coverage may be essential to pleasing workers in a competitive environment. "As a result, any projections of those effects are clearly quite uncertain," the study's authors concluded.

ROMNEY on cutting the deficit: "Obamacare's on my list. ... I'm going to stop the subsidy to PBS. ... I'll make government more efficient."

THE FACTS: Romney has promised to balance the budget in eight years to 10 years, but he hasn't offered a complete plan. Instead, he's promised a set of principles, some of which - like increasing Pentagon spending and restoring more than $700 billion in cuts that Democrats made in Medicare over the coming decade - work against his goal. He also has said he will not consider tax increases.

He pledges to shrink the government to 20 percent of the size of the economy, as opposed to more than 23 percent of gross domestic product now, by the end of his first term. The Romney campaign estimates that would require cuts of $500 billion from the 2016 budget alone. He also has pledged to cut tax rates by 20 percent, paying for them by eliminating tax breaks for the wealthiest and through economic growth.

To fulfill his promise, then, Romney would require cuts to other programs so deep - under one calculation requiring cutting many areas of the domestic budget by one-third within four years - that they could never get through Congress. Cuts to domestic agencies would have to be particularly deep.

But he's offered only a few modest examples of government programs he'd be willing to squeeze, like subsidies to PBS and Amtrak. He does want to repeal Obama's big health care law, but that law is actually forecast to reduce the deficit.

ROMNEY: "Simpson-Bowles, the president should have grabbed that."

OBAMA: "That's what we've done, made some adjustments to it, and we're putting it before Congress right now, a $4 trillion plan."

THE FACTS: At first, the president did largely ignore the recommendations made by his deficit commission headed by Democrat Erskine Bowles and Republican Alan Simpson. He later incorporated some of the proposals, largely the less controversial ones. He did not endorse some of the politically troublesome recommendations, as trimming popular tax deductions like the one for home mortgage interest.

Associated Press writers Andrew Taylor, Stephen Ohlemacher, Jonathan Fahey, Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar, Tom Raum, Christopher S. Rugaber and Brian Bakst contributed to this report.

the nearby town of Whiteclay, Neb., led to a barrage of media coverage. Alcohol is banned at the reservation, but stores in the Nebraska town that has about a dozen residents and that's just two miles away sold the equivalent of 4.3 million, 12-ounce cans of beer.

A federal judge dismissed the lawsuit Monday, saying the case belonged in state court. The judge did not rule on the merits of the suit, which blames beer makers and the stores for chronic alcoholism on the reservation.

Before the lawsuit, an ABC documentary titled "A Hidden America: Children of the Plains" that aired last year drew both appreciation and consternation among tribal members because it focused on poverty, alcoholism and violence on the reservation.

More recently, Oprah Winfrey's OWN aired "Life on the Rez" part of its "Our America" series hosted by journalist Lisa Ling, in July. Rapper Lupe Fiasco mentioned Pine Ridge in his hit single "Around My Way" and tweeted photos from an impromptu visit to the reservation. And in August, National Geographic Magazine featured a 36-page spread documenting the history of the Lakota people, the poverty that has become entwined in their lives and efforts to overcome it.

Arriving to cover a story with a narrative already decided before the first interview is conducted isn't new in journalism. It's happened in Detroit with reporters writing about empty schools, skyscrapers and factories after the city's economy faltered. There's even a term for it: ruin porn. In Brazil, shantytowns known as favelas and the associated poverty and gang activity is a common thread that sees a lot of newspaper ink.

Giago has blasted "beer-sniffing reporters" who swoop in to Pine Ridge to report a story about alcoholism on the reservation without fully appreciating why the reservation has the statistics it does. Reporters often miss the people who are running the anti-alcohol programs or the schools trying to educate tribal members so they can get a job, he said.

Yet that media coverage on poverty and alcoholism has drawn many people from outside the reservation to donate their time and money to travel to Pine Ridge to try to

"It's the sort of story that Al Jazeera does. It fits very much with our mission," said Brian Wheeler, a producer with Al Jazeera English based in Washington, D.C., who traveled to Pine Ridge in May with two others to report on the alcohol lawsuit. It was Wheeler's first time to South Dakota and the reservation, he said.

"The level of poverty here is striking," he said outside the tribal headquarters as he set up an interview with Oglala Sioux Vice President Tom Poor Bear.

Poor Bear asked the Al Jazeera reporters why they were coming to Pine Ridge just to report about the issue of alcoholism.

"Why don't you guys write anything good about us," he asked?

Still, some tribal members said they are grateful for any media coverage.

Helen Red Feather, who lives in the Wounded Knee district of the reservation, said a few select people in power tend to keep the rest of the tribe down.

"I want people to see what's going on in this reservation," the 57-year-old said as she hawked beaded jewelry near the site of the Wounded Knee Massacre, where hundreds of men, women and children were killed by the 7th Cavalry in 1890. "We have nothing."

COMMENTARY

Red and White race relations 22 years later

Notes from Indian Country

TIM GIAGO (Nanwica Kciji) © 2012 Unity South Dakota

October 8 was Native American Day in South Dakota, the only state in the Union that honors Native Americans with a state sanctioned holiday: A holiday that, in fact, replaces Columbus

Many Native Americans went to bat to cause this to happen. The primary motivator was the 100th anniversary of the massacre at Wounded Knee. Many Lakota felt that something special needed to be done to commemorate the nearly 300 Lakota men, women and children that were shot down in cold blood by elements of the 7th Cavalry, Custer's old outfit, on December 29, 1890.

Birgil Kills Straight organized a horse ride that would follow the exact path taken by Sitanka (Big Foot) and his band of Lakota as they fled to the Pine Ridge Reservation seeking protection under the auspices of Chief Red Cloud. The band was stopped at Wounded Knee Creek by the United States military and the rest is history.

As the editor and publisher of the local Pine Ridge Reservation newspaper called The Lakota Times back then, I watched with great interest the efforts of Kills Straight as he set about planning the trail the riders would take. At the end of the ride Kills Straight decided to hold a ceremony at the mass gravesite at Wounded Knee where a Wiping Away the Tears Ceremony would be held and the riders would pray for the souls of those buried there and for peace and justice. Their commitment was a powerful motivator to me. I immediately wrote an editorial pointing out these facts to Governor George Mickelson (R-SD) and requested that he use this solemn occasion to consider naming a day to honor those who died at Wounded Knee and to use the days leading up to the massacre date as a Year of Reconciliation between Native Americans and whites.

Ironically, in 1989, I did an interview with Gov. Mickelson and asked him what the toughest part of his job was as governor of South Dakota. He replied, "I will give you the same answer my father gave me when I asked him the same question when he was governor of South Dakota. My father said that the toughest part of his job was the bad race relations between Indians and

Together, the governor and I, along with strong support from Lakota people like Kills Straight, Pete Swift Bird, Sr., Red Hail, Melvin "Dickie" Brewer and non-Indians like Tom Katus, Senator Tom Daschle, and Jeff and Linda Lea Viken, we lobbied, twisted arms, and cajoled our way through the state legislators until they passed the Native American Day holiday and Gov. Mickelson issued a proclamation making 1990 The Year of Reconciliation.

All has not been sugar and spice since that historic year. Many local businesses are still holding their "Columbus Day" sales and even residents of the Indian reservations fail to realize the significance of the holiday and just use it as a day to take off from school and work.

Racial relations have improved quite dramatically, but then the only way they had to go was up. And yet just last week an ugly sign on a bathroom wall at South Dakota State University illustrated the hate and ignorance that still exists. The sign read, "Prairie Niggers, go back to the rez," and it even listed the room numbers where Native Americans were housed at the university.

Yesterday I drove into a lane where I bank and as I waited for my transaction I noticed a man in the passenger side of the car next to me talking on a cell phone. His window was rolled down, as was mine, so I could hear every word. He was shouting into the phone, "There is this bunch of drunken Indians in my neighborhood, yeah that's right, drunken Indians, so I put padlocks on all of my doors."

Of course the bank teller could hear every word he was saying and since she knew me and she knew I was also listening she looked quite dismayed. I finally said to the man, "If those guys were a bunch of white guys would you call them drunken white guys or just drunks?" He frowned at me as the driver pulled away from the bank. The teller buzzed me and said, "Thanks Tim."

Gradually we have made progress in racial relations in South Dakota. Many folks living in cities back east who have seen bad race relations between whites and blacks or Hispanics do not realize that there is the same situation in states like South Dakota, Idaho, Montana and North Dakota to name a few. It has been just over 100 years since the Indians and whites were at war with each other and the bad feelings have carried over in the minds of some people of both

As long as there are good people like the ones I named above we will continue to move forward. I know there is still racial tension in the schools and I think it is up to the superintendents and teachers to address this problem and it is up to the parents as well. But when racial epithets are scribbled on the walls of the rest rooms at a major college, it may be time to take another look at Native American Day, reconciliation, and all of the things many of us have fought so hard and so long to overcome. But as the Black anthem of the 1960s goes, "We shall overcome."

Tim Giago, an Oglala Lakota, is President of Unity South Dakota. He was a Nieman Fellow at Harvard with the Class of 1991. His weekly column won the H. L. Mencken Award in 1985. Giago was the founder and first president of the Native American Journalists Association and the founder of Indian Country Today. He can be reached at UnitySoDak1@knology. net

5 tips to rev up your career this Fall

Career coach and author Ford R. Myers offers the following tips to get your career back on track this fall.

HAVERFORD, Penn. - Fall is now officially here. That means it's time to hang-up the beach bag, dry out the swim trunks, and focus on career advancement.

Ford R. Myers, Career Coach, Speaker and Author of "Get The Job You Want, Even When No One's Hiring," (John Wiley & Sons, http://www. getthejobbook.com) offers the following five tips to help job seekers get out of their summer "career coma" and focus on fall career success:

1. Create and Control Your Internet Image. Whether it's LinkedIn, YouTube, Twitter or Facebook, every professional should have an online presence. Most employers research job candidates on the Internet before making hiring decisions. Therefore, it is vitally important that you take control of your online identity, and carefully monitor the "personal brand" you're building on the Internet.

Invest in Career Coaching. It might seem that career coaching would be a luxury in this difficult economic climate, but actually, this might be the best time to get some career coaching. A qualified Career Coach can help you get totally clear on your objective, differentiate yourself from the competition, market yourself effectively, get the offer, and negotiate the best compensation.

3. Tune into the Network. Early fall is one of the best times of the year to make new connections and find new opportunities. With folks returning from vacation and refocusing on work, there are many fall networking functions, planning meetings and group events. These are ideal environments in which to build your network.

4. Perform an Internal Career Audit. September is a perfect time to take an honest look at your career - where you've been, where you are today, and where you'd like to go. Identify new goals based on your own definition of career success, take action, and then follow through.

5. Update Your Career "Tool Kit." Most job seekers use only their résumé as the cornerstone of their search because their other "tools" are weak or nonexistent. But there are many other documents you should have in your "career tool kit" - accomplishment stories, positioning statement, one-page biography, target company list, contact list, professional references, letters of recommendation, and more. These items are important not just to land the next job - but also to maximize your longterm career success.

"There really couldn't be a better time than Fall to launch a professional job search. Hiring managers are back in their offices making employment decisions for the fall and early 2013," says Myers.

VOTERS

Walking Bull said. "We had a booth at Rosebud fair and registered 25 voters in one day."

Rosebud The Sioux contingency hits the usual spots like the local Indian clinic, but they also think outside of the box to find new voters. For instance, Walking Bull recently visited the nearby St. Francis Indian School. Inside the senior classrooms, they came up with a hidden cache of would-be voters-students who turned 18 or were about to become of age. They came away with new registers at St. Francis.

Finding the potential voter is only part of the challenge. Rising above voter apathy in communities of color is a big challenge, experts said. Mark Morial, president of the National Urban League (NAL) in Washington, D.C., said minorities often don't see the value of voting even after they are registered.

"One reason is that candidates who run do not aggressively seek minority votes," Morial said. "Plus, politicians may have a habit of reneging on campaign promises in previous elections."

Morial sees a powerful voting bloc in future elections if minorities unite. As its own group, statistics show Indian voters made a respectable showing in 2008. According to the U.S. Census current population survey, among Alaska Natives and Indians who registered; some 78 percent turned out to vote.

Wind River Reservation citizen, Roy Brown, president of the University of Oklahoma's Law School Indian society, said he finds Indians in a college town live and interact in pockets. His goal is to find those pockets.

"It's about getting Indians to register to vote, no matter where they are and there's still not enough people interested in the political process," he said.

Scouting for potential new voters in his corner of Indian Country motivates Walking Bull, who believes that the Native voting fields are ripe for harvest even as the registration deadline for the presidential election approaches. In South Dakota, voter registration ends on Oct. 22.

""I tell them, 'We are all Indian nations, we don't care who you vote for, just get out there and vote," Walking Bull said.

In Oklahoma, the last day to register to vote is Oct. 12 and Nov. 6 is the presidential election. Voters can also register online. Turbo Vote at http://nativevote.turbovote.org will mail voter registration materials to homes with a pre-stamped envelope, NCAI officials said.

MCN officials announce Hall of Fame inductees

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

TULSA, Okla. – A baseball player, an author, an elder and a caretaker will be among the first class inducted into the Muscogee (Creek) Nation Hall of Fame.

Muscogee (Creek) Nation officials announced the selections of Allie P. Reynolds, Joy Harjo, Simon Harry and Elsie Martin Friday morning. The four will be formally inducted on Oct. 11 at a black tie gala at the RiverSpirit Event Center emceed by former National Council member and current mayor of Eufaula, Okla., Selina Jayne-Dornan.

"We had about 100 applications," Muscogee (Creek) Nation tourism director William Lowe said. "We started with four main areas: the arts, volunteering and community service, business development and public affairs.

"With these four though, it was hard to put them in a single category. Their names kept coming up."

A native of Oklahoma City, Reynolds won six World Series titles with the New York Yankees and was named to Major League Baseball's All-Star game six times during a 12-season career. The baseball stadium at his alma mater, Oklahoma State University, was named for him in 1981 and in 1989, the New York Yankees dedicated a plaque to him beyond the centerfield fence in Yankee Stadium, the organization's highest honor. Reynolds died in 1994 at age 77.

Originally from Tulsa, Harjo is an award-winning poet, author and musician. The winner of the 2011 Myskoke Women's Leadership award, she has released five albums and published 15 books of poetry, two children's books and a memoir.

Harry is a Euchee elder and the leader of the Duck Creek ceremonial grounds in northern Okmulgee County. The Euchees are a tribal community within the Muscogee (Creek) Nation that is working on gaining separate federal recognition.

"The Euchees are a big part of who we are as Muscogee (Creek) people," Principal Chief George Tiger said. "He (Harry) has been one of the driving forces in keeping the Euchee tradition, language and culture alive."

For more than 20 years, Martin was the primary caregiver for Ray Murphy, a former Oklahoma State University wrestler who became a quadriplegic after a 1970 wrestling accident. Originally from Tulsa, Martin now lives in Phoenix, Ariz.

"When you talk about the Murphy family, you talk about the Martin family as well," Tiger said.

The Hall of Fame will replace the tribe's Living Legends program. Previous recipients who were honored annually at the Muskogee (Creek) National Holiday will be grandfathered in.

"We wanted to take it up a notch and honor these people in a way they'll always remember," Tiger said.

For more information contact the Muscogee (Creek) Nation Tourism & Recreation department at 918.732.7992 or by e-mail at tourism@muscogeenation-nsn.gov.

Library to honor filmmaker Sterlin Harjo

"Barking Water," Harjo's 2008 dramatic feature film, was the only American film to play in the Venice Days section of the 2009 Venice Film Festival.

TULSA, Okla. – Sterlin Harjo, Seminole/Muscogee (Creek), will receive the Tulsa Library Trust's "American Indian Writers Award" March 2, 2013 at 10:30 a.m. at Central Library, Fourth Street and Denver Avenue. His award presentation will be followed by a day of educational American Indian family events.

In 2006 he was selected as one of the inaugural recipients, as well as the first Native American recipient, of the United States Artists Fellowship. He also was selected for a 2006 Media Arts Fellowship from Renew Media. In the same year, he won the Creative Promise Award from Tribeca All Access for his script "Before the Beast Returns."

Harjo's first feature film, "Four Sheets to the Wind," premiered at the 2007 Sundance Film Festival. This film was a product of his selection as one of the Sundance Institute's first five Annenberg Film Fellows.

"Barking Water," Harjo's 2008 dramatic feature film, premiered at the Sundance Film Festival and was the only American film to play in the Venice Days section of the 2009 Venice Film Festival. He is one of seven indigenous filmmakers who participated in the Embargo Collective, a project started in 2008 by imagineNATIVE Film & Media Arts Festival. ## DOJ policy says American Indians can have eagle feathers

Wildflife repository specialist Dennis Wiist looks for a place to hang eagles that are ready to be sent out in one of the two freezers on Aug. 21, 2009, in Commerce City, Colo. All useable parts of the eagle bodies are kept so Native American religious practitioners have the requisite eagle feathers and talons for ceremonines.

PETE YOST Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Justice Department said Friday it's going to allow citizens of federally recognized American Indian tribes to possess eagle feathers, although that's a federal crime.

This is a significant religious and cultural issue for many tribes, who were consulted in advance about the policy the department announced.

The Bald and Golden Eagle Protection Act and other federal wildlife laws criminalize the killing of eagles, which are listed as either endangered or threatened, and possession of feathers and bird parts, but the Constitution and federal laws also give tribes local sovereignty for self-government.

Under the new Justice Department policy, tribal members will not be prosecuted for wearing or carrying federally protected birds, bird feathers or parts. They also may pick up feathers found in the wild as long as they do not disturb federally protected birds or nests. Giving, lending or trading feathers or bird parts among tribe members, without any other compensation, also will be allowed.

While Justice did not previously have a written policy, the new directive is in line with long-standing practice by Justice prosecutors, U.S. attorneys and the Interior Department not to prosecute in such circumstances.

But the Justice Department will continue to prosecute tribe members and nonmembers alike for violating federal laws that prohibit killing eagles and other migratory birds or the buying or selling the feathers or other bird

In addition, members of federally recognized tribes are covered by the new Justice Department policy regardless of whether they have a U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service permit, during the Inter-Tribal Council of the Five Civilized Tribes quarterly session.

TULSA, Okla. — One of the Bureau of Indian Affairs' larger regional offices will soon be under new leadership.

Speaking before more than 60 people at the quarterly general session of the Inter-Tribal Council of the Five Civilized Tribes at the RiverSpirit Event Center Friday morning, acting regional director Karen Ketcher announced that a candidate has been selected to be the new permanent regional director and his application is being reviewed and vetted.

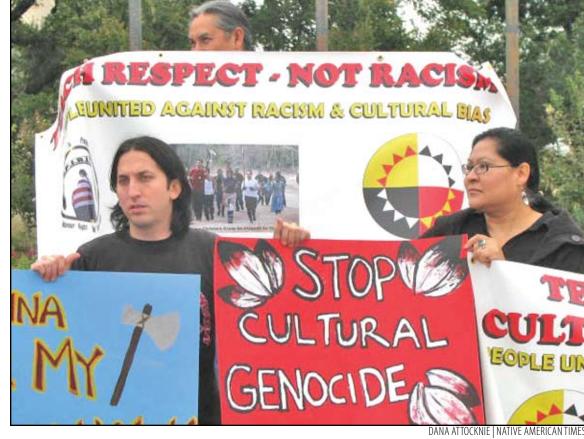

She did not announce the candidate's

"Our goal is to have him in office by Nov. 1," she said. "I look forward to working with the (Inter-Tribal) council as I go back to my old position as deputy regional director."

Based out of Muskogee, Okla., the BIA's Eastern Oklahoma regional office has seven agencies and serves 18 of Oklahoma's 39 federally recognized tribes, including the Cherokee, Chickasaw, Choctaw, Muscogee (Creek) and Seminole nations. It has not had a permanent director since 2009, when then-director Jeannette Hanna was detailed to Washington D.C.

An ongoing leadership dispute between Janice Prairie Chief-Boswell and Leslie Wandrie-Harjo has created two governments and led to frozen tribal bank accounts with the First Bank and Trust of Clinton, Okla. Since June 21, the bank accounts have been under the supervision of the Custer County District Court. ## Okla. governor cancels meeting with SPIRIT group, rally goes on

OKLAHOMA CITY Members of the Society to Protect Indigenous Rights & Indigenous (SPIRIT) gather Oct. 11, in front of the Oklahoma State Capitol to speak out against racism, and human and civil rights violations based on color.

The peaceful demonstration comes a little over a month after a Kay County officer handcuffed and questioned a Mohawk Nation tribal member who was participating in the Peace and Dignity Journey 2012 run. On Sept. 5 the runner was on a dirt road headed to the Ponca City Indian Methodist Church. He was coming from Wichita, Kan., and was carrying an eagle staff, which the officer directed him to place on the ground. This directive alone has caused outrage in the Native community because it's considered a desecration of the eagle staff.

"The use of an eagle staff is not the use of a weapon. That's what brought us here today," Corey Tabor said. "We came here because our traditional ways are still under attack. We believe that this is an injustice that has not been acknowledged."

Adelegation of SPIRIT members arranged a meeting with Jeffrey Cantmell, the assistant general counsel to Gov. Mary Fallin and the director of cultural affairs, the morning of the protest however the meeting was canceled late the day before due to a "scheduling conflict." SPIRIT members wished to address racism, bias in prosecutions and law enforcement violations during the meeting.

Yet, despite the meeting cancellation a rally was still held and SPIRIT members took turns testifying about the unequal treatment of Native Americans and people of color in Oklahoma.

"The federal law says we are all supposed to be treated equal. That does not happen in this country. We're here to fight for equal rights for our Indigenous people and for respect for Indigenous people. Here in Oklahoma, of all places, Native Americans should not have to fight for equal treatment. The name of our state means Red People and people of color should be respected here," Fannie Bates said. "We need to educate our kids, we need to educate our adults, and we need to stand up for the rights of all Indigenous people whether they are citizens of the United States or whether they are visiting this country."

War Pony Community Outreach founder on mission to help families

KAREN SHADE
Native American Times

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. — When you talk to Raymond Vann about War Pony Community Outreach, you have to ask the right questions. Vann is not one to bring it up in relation to himself.

The nonprofit organization has helped people in the Cherokee Nation's 14-county jurisdiction in need of financial help with utility bill payments, diapers, emergency home repairs, appliances, clothing and other resources since it began in 2003 with Vann and a small group of friends and neighbors, including Sioux Smith-Vann, Jack and Catherine Christie, Art Floyd and Sally Williams.

"There was a need for it," said the U.S. Army veteran. "That was the main thing. We kept getting more calls from people needing stuff."

The organization, in fact, grew out of Vann's effort to see that people's basic needs were met. After a 30-year career with General Motors at its plant in Arlington, Texas, Vann retired in 1995 and returned to Oklahoma. Raised in the Chewey community in Adair County, he and his former wife settled in Tahlequah. When he thinks of Chewey, he remembers fishing and a good life.

"Sometimes it was hard. Most of the time it was good," he said.

He also remembers the poverty around him and how his grandmother, Tina Gibson, used to help everyone who came to her. She was well known in Chewey, and her work left an impression on him forever.

"I've done it (help people) off and on always, and my grandmother used to do it," he said.

In Tahlequah, he and his former wife came across the same need and decided to do what they could. When friends decided to join their efforts, they formally established the organization and applied for tax exempt status, which it received the following year.

Why "war pony" for the name? Because a warrior takes care of the people, defends them and helps see to their basic need, he said.

Those needs can be anything from a sack of groceries to see a family through until pay day, help to pay medical bills or referrals to agencies for legal advisement. For John Cornsilk, a leak in his roof brought Vann to his home more than eight years ago.

A Cherokee elder and member of the United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians in Oklahoma, Cornsilk first went to the Cherokee Nation for financial assistance to repair the roof. Little came of his appeal to the tribe for help, he said. He then received a call from Vann, who had heard of his situation and offered to do what he could to help.

"He said he wanted to help through his organization and in two weeks, I had a new roof," Cornsilk said.

In the years of their acquaintance, Cornsilk has donated items for War Pony that went to others who needed assistance and offered his help in other ways.

"I've known Raymond for a long time. We're good friends," Cornsilk said. "I never got into helping (people), but that's his life, doing things for people."

War Pony is run from his home. He stores what donations of goods he receives in a garage. The outreach assists on average between 15-20 individuals every month. Rural living can be hard enough economically where there is little work. In a down economy when jobs can't open quickly enough, people turn to organizations like War Pony for assistance. And War Pony helps everyone whether they are Cherokee or of another tribe or of no tribe at all. It's even aided people living in Cornsilk said Vann has been known to dig into his own pockets when War Pony's funds are inadequate.

Vann said the organization is getting more aid from the Cherokee Nation, but private donations make up 75 percent of what it takes in.

War Pony is a full-time job, keeping him busy most days of the week, either working on houses, picking up donated appliances and answering calls from people in need.

In 2011 he ran for Cherokee Nation deputy chief, a natural step. The loss of that election, however, hasn't kept him organizing Christmas toy drives for the children (500 last year, 1,000 this year) or from thinking of solutions to create more jobs locally that can sustain and stabilize families.

Why does he do it? Vann said his work through War Pony Community Outreach is an opportunity to get to know others and for him to stay

"There's no need to come home and sit around. Once you do that, you just go downhill," he said. "There's always something that needs to be done and a lot of people with needs. I do what I can with what time I have."

Although resources are limited, Vann, War Pony and its volunteers hope to catch all those people who, as Vann said, fall through the cracks – single-parent families, the elderly and sick or injured.

In 2010, both Vann and Cornsilk were recognized by the American Association of Retired Persons with AARP Indian Elder Honors. Cornsilk was named for his work toward recognition of descendants of the Freedmen in the Tribe. Vann was awarded for taking care of Cherokee people.

"He'll go out of his way if he sees you need something," Cornsilk said. Vann isn't after awards.

"It's not about trying to make myself look good or make me feel good," he said. "But it does make me feel good to see someone, the look on their face."

NCAIED launches first regional conference in November

■ The National Center for American Indian Economic Development will host a Reservation Economic Summit on Nov. 14-15 at the Hard Rock Hotel & Casino in Catoosa, Okla.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

CATOOSA, Okla. - Nativeowned businesses and contracting opportunities will be on display next month as a national organization launches its first regional conference.

The National Center for American Indian Economic Development will be hosting its first regional Reservation Economic Summit, RES Oklahoma, Nov. 14-15 at the Hard Rock Hotel and Casino in Catoosa.

"It's a great honor as a Cherokee Nation citizen that our first regional event will be in the Cherokee Nation," NCAIED Chief Executive Officer and President Gary Davis said. "We (NCAIED) have such a great relationship with the tribal leaders in Oklahoma."

Since 1980, the organization has hosted an annual national RES event in Las Vegas, featuring speakers, panels, a trade fair and networking opportunities for Native American entrepreneurs, tribal economic and business development decisionmakers, tribal leaders, government and corporate executives and buyers seeking Native American suppliers and contractors.

"At our last RES event, more than $1 billion in contracts were signed in one day," said Margo Gray-Proctor, chairwoman of NCAIED's board of directors. "That kind of impact is power. It also means opportunity and a chance to combat our social ills."

Gray-Proctor, co-principal of Horizon Engineering in Tulsa, Okla., said the event will primarily focus on three areas: entrepreneurs, tribal enterprises and using the power of sovereignty to diversify business interests in Indian Country.

"I know many of our Oklahoma tribes are familiar with government contracting, but not all of them necessarily are," Gray-Proctor said. "This is one way to help get exposed to that."

Among the speakers scheduled for this year's event are Lance Morgan, the president and CEO of Ho-Chunk, Inc., former Osage Nation chief Jim Gray and David Hinson, the national director of the United States Minority Business Development Agency.

"Part of what we believe as an organization is that there is so much economic development in Indian Country that this can serve as a catalyst to further that discussion," Davis said.

Davis said the Mesa, Ariz.-based center is looking at a second regional event for summer 2013, in part because of the demand for spots at the RES event at Mandalay Bay, but also in response to next month's summit at Hard Rock.

"The trade show has already sold out," he said. "Registration has been phenomenal. In many cases, I think people have been waiting for this (a regional conference) to happen.

In a way, this is simply taking what the RES event in Las Vegas - and what the folks who attend take away from it - means and bringing it to people who might not necessarily be able to travel that far. This very exciting opportunity to begin to grow this into regional events that will to live on in tribal land, give people the opportunity who can't make it to Las Vegas to get a two-day

It's exciting for me. This is something that is long overdue for Indian Country and I'm just happy to be in a position to help provide that kind of event."

The organization will also present its national awards during RES Oklahoma, including college scholarships, the Jay Silverheels awards, the First American Entrepreneurship awards, the First American Corporate Leadership award and recognition of the center's 2012 "40 Under 40" list.

"Twelveofour'40Under40'recipients this year are from Oklahoma," Gray-Proctor said. "It helps that there are so many tribes here, but it is impressive to see so many of our area young people listed among the best and brightest in Indian Country."

U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder says the new policy strikes the right balance between enforcing wildlife laws and respecting the cultural and religious practices of tribes.

Attorney General Eric Holder said in a memo to U.S. attorney offices around the country.

Holder said the new policy was issued to address concerns of tribal members who were unsure of how they might be affected by federal wildlife law enforcement efforts, particularly whether a permit would be required.

The Fish and Wildlife Service issues a very limited number of permits for Indians to kill eagles in the wild or obtain feathers and carcasses of accidentally killed eagles from a federal repository.

Doug Craven, the natural resources director for the Little Traverse Bay Bands of Odawa Indians in Michigan, said tribal members there frequently encounter feathers from around 25 bald eagle nesting sites on their reservation.

But it wasn't always clear to them whether they could keep the feathers for ceremonial use or if they'd have to send them off to a repository.

"They feel that's been gifted to them and they have a responsibility for that feather," said Craven, who was part of a group consulting with the Justice Department on the eagle feather policy. "This policy supports that."

While tradition and customs vary widely among the more than 500 federally recognized tribes, a high reverence for eagles is fairly consistent.

Holder said the new Justice Department policy strikes the right balance between enforcing wildlife laws that protect eagles and respecting the cultural and religious practices of federally recognized Indian tribes.

"From time immemorial, many native Americans have viewed eagle feathers and other bird parts as sacred elements of their religious and cultural traditions," said Assistant Attorney General Ignacia Moreno, head of the department's environment and natural resources division. She called the new policy "a major step forward by establishing a consistent and transparent policy to guide federal enforcement of the nation's wildlife laws."

Currently, a depository near Denver holds the carcasses of eagles that are killed by contact with power lines or other causes. Indians may apply for a feather or a carcass. There is a wait to get the feathers.

The Fish and Wildlife Service has issued a few permits allowing tribes to kill eagles in the wild.

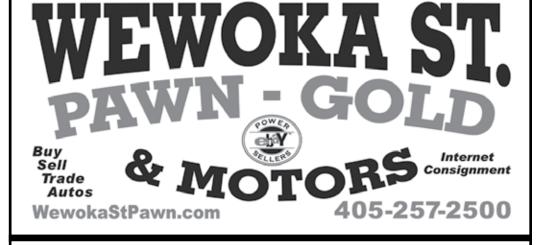

The Hopi Tribe has killed golden eagles under a federal permit for years. The Northern Arapaho Tribe of Wyoming received a federal permit from the Fish and Wildlife Service earlier this year that would allow the tribe to take up to two bald eagles a year for use in the tribe's annual Sun

However, the Northern Arapaho are suing the Fish and Wildlife Service in federal

The tribe argues the federal permit is meaningless because it would limit the tribe to killing bald eagles outside the Wind River Indian Reservation, but a Wyoming state law prohibits killing eagles outside the reservation.

"Where every day is Indian Day"

PNC hopes to attract crowds with new art, film festival

■ The festival has received man entries for the film portion of the event, most categorized as short works.

KAREN SHADE Native American Times

A small college in Pawnee wants the world's attention if only for a few days in October.

Pawnee Nation College is hosting the Oklahoma Native Arts & Media Festival, Oct. 24-27. The event has scheduled film screenings, art shows, music entertainment, comedy performances and crafts vendors spread across four days on the school campus and other locations. The hope is that visitors will also learn what Pawnee Nation College has to offer.

"The target of the festival is to make the college more visible and more attainable for enrollment - for all students and for the community," said festival Chair Alfreda Doonkeen, Seminole and Yaqui. "The school is not restricted only to American Indians, but it is created by and sponsored by the Pawnee Nation."

Pawnee Nation College is housed at the old Pawnee Indian Boarding School and Pawnee Agency headquarters, a campus of several historical buildings located at 861 Little Dee Drive in the town of Pawnee, both county seat and tribal headquarters of the Pawnee Nation of Oklahoma. The school opened in 2004 with a diverse curriculum under the umbrella accreditation of Bacone College in Muskogee and offered core curriculum courses in math, English and science along with courses for study programs, particularly American Indian studies, construction trades, art, business and computer science.

The plan to bring higher education to the Pawnee Nation Reserve, however, goes back to the late 1970s when the tribe's business council had a plan developed for a two-year college.

Lack of resources forced the Nation to table the plan. Another attempt to bring higher learning to the reserve (an Information Technology academy) in the 1990s was unsuccessful, but the experience helped lay a foundation for what would become Pawnee Nation College.

Built on a mission to "indigenize" higher education, the school offers the local community education with a Native perspective. The school has nearly 50 students enrolled, mostly in American Indian studies course work, said Joseph Bohanon, PNC president.

"It's a good place to start," he said.

Credits transfer to four-year universities and colleges. While the PNC seeks its own accreditation, it also has plans to provide curriculum in agriculture and nutritional sciences, business administration studies emphasizing gaming specialties, medical assistant and pre-law programs and management and health certificate programs.

Some programs are already available through distance learning and online capabilities. With so much to offer the citizens of the Pawnee Nation, the residents of Pawnee and potential students, the college is little known outside of the students and faculty.

This inaugural arts festival could change that, said Bohanon, Choctaw.

"It's going to be a historic event. The college has never put something like this together with this many partnerships as we have," he said. "We have some really talented artists, producers who are going to be there for the four days."

Among them will be festival spotlight artist Bunky Echo-Hawk, Pawnee. "I'm really honored to be a part of it," Echo-Hawk said. "It's an opportunity to showcase Native art, and I hope to represent as a Pawnee artist and as a contemporary artist. I'm looking forward to it."

Echo-Hawk is scheduled to attend the festival opening reception, booked for 5-8 p.m. Oct. 24 at the Pawnee Nation Cultural Center, 657 Harrison St., in downtown Pawnee.

Admission will not be charged at the art show opening reception, but donations to support the college will be accepted at the door.

Film screenings will begin at 2 p.m. Oct. 25 also in the cultural center. The festival has received many entries for the film portion of the event, most categorized as short works. Subjects include the Native American Church, alcohol and drug abuse in Osage country and other topics of cultural significance.

On Oct. 26, morning and afternoon events will be for students attending the Oklahoma Native Leadership Initiative conference, but at 5 p.m., the 49 Laughs Comedy Show opens to all at the cultural center. Among the group is Anadarko native Adrianne Chalepah, Kiowa and Apache. Chalepah gave the invocation for First Lady Michelle Obama at a rally in Durango, Colo. Show admission is $5. Vendors will open, however, Oct. 26 beginning at noon and all day Oct. 27 on the college grounds and the Pawnee County Courthouse Square.

Festivities and attractions include arts and crafts vendors, food vendors, artist demonstrations, storytelling, children's programming, poetry slams and more. Look for a 10k, 5k and kids' fun run in the morning, Art and film award winners will be named on the last day.

Excepting the opening reception, event admission is $5 for adults (or $8 for a two-day pass), $4 for active military personnel with identification and $3 for ages 6-17. Admission is free for elders (55 and up) and children under 6. Proceeds of the event go to benefit programs and services offered by Pawnee Nation College. ## COMMENTARY

'What the hell, they're only Indians'

Notes from Indian Country

TIM GIAGO (Nanwica Kciji) © 2012 Unity South Dakota

Melvin "Dickie" Brewer, a classmate of mine at the Holy Rosary Indian Mission on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota, and a lifelong friend, like so many Indian boys and girls faced with the hardships of growing up in poverty, developed a drinking problem.

It became a little more pronounced while he served in the military and one day while in Paris he was arrested and spent a couple of days in the infamous Bastille. He used to quip, "I'm probably the only Sioux Indian that ever did time in the Bastille."

This wasn't something he was proud of but it was the irony of the situation that settled in his mind. It also motivated him to do something about it. He went on with his education and eventually became a substance abuse counselor at Pine Ridge. He and his then wife Alma bought an old house and tried to refurbish it and turn it into a home where homeless alcoholics could stay while undergoing rehabilitation. Of course they didn't count on the near impossibility of raising money. They searched high and low through every agency and program they could find, but it seemed that treating alcoholism on the Pine Ridge Reservation was not too high on the priority list of

As a lifelong resident of the reservation Dickie saw the problems presented to the residents of Pine Ridge because of the easy availability of alcohol in the nearby, just across the border, community of Whiteclay, Nebraska. It didn't deter him from doing his job and working with the heavy drinkers to find a cure.

Dickie used say, "You know, when I was a drinker nobody put a gun to my head and said drink that beer. I did it all by myself."

Dickie believed that the prohibition of the sale of alcohol on the reservation was a bigger problem than opening the reservation. He firmly believed that as long as the sale of alcohol was forbidden on the reservation those prone to alcohol consumption would just go across the border to buy it.

"If we had legal sales here at Pine Ridge we could use the tax dollars to combat the disease. We could have well-funded programs, more counselors and more control over the sale of liquor and this would go a long way to help us cure this terrible disease," he used to say.

That was many years ago and today one of the strongest advocates of legalizing the sale of alcohol on the reservation is an elected member of the Oglala Sioux Tribal Council from the Pejuta Haka (Medicine Root) District of the reservation named James "Toby" Big Boy. When a lawsuit was brought against the alcohol distributors and manufacturers and four liquor stores in Whiteclay, Big Boy knew the suit was frivolous, but he also felt that at least something was being done.

Suing a liquor store is like suing a gun manufacturer because a gun was used in an armed robbery or murder. It was not the gun that did the damage but the person using it. And the same can be said of alcohol.

The reasons there is a problem with alcohol consumption in Indian Country are many and it would take volumes to explain it. One that is either overlooked or downplayed happened when thousands of Indian children were institutionalized beginning in the late 1800s and continuing into the 1960s. They were taken from their homes and families and placed in Bureau of Indian Affairs or church mission boarding schools in an effort to de-Indianize them.

Like those Jews interred in concentration camps during World War II, they were stripped of their clothing and issued identical clothes, had their heads shaved, pushed into dormitories, forbidden to speak their Native tongues, beaten and abused for the slightest infraction, taught that everything "Indian" was bad including their parents and grandparents if they still were clinging to the old ways. Thousands of these children had never before experienced corporal punishment until the boarding schools. Beaten with leather belts and locked in dark closets for hours, two or three generations of Indian children were pushed out of these schools and onto the reservations or streets totally confused about who they were and what life expected of them. More often than not, many of these children were sexually abused by their keepers.

Again, thousands of these children, now adults, turned to alcohol to forget and probably because it numbed them of these memories. The abused, as often happens, became the abusers and another generation of children experienced the trauma of their parents. It is a cyclical thing that the Indian people themselves are trying so hard to break.

There is another entire chapter that must be written about the loss of land, traditions, culture, dignity and selfesteem as perpetrated by the United States government over the past 200 years that greatly contributed to the problems related to the alcohol and drug consumption among American Indians. Indians were the guinea pigs of social experiments for more than 200 years. Esteemed attorney Felix S. Cohen called Indians "miner's canaries" because every social experiment intended to improve life in America was tested on them first to see if it would fly. As can be expected, many of the social experiments did more harm than good, but as one anonymous government official said back then, "What the hell, they're only Indians."

AICCM audit targets money management problems

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

OKLAHOMA CITY — An audit released Wednesday has uncovered multiple problems with a partially completed American Indian Cultural Center and Museum.

Earlier this year, Gov. Mary Fallin requested an audit of the Native American Cultural and Educational Authority. Created in 1994, the authority oversees a proposed cultural center and museum that currently sits partially completed at 900 N. Broadway Ave.

"The purpose of a performance audit is to provide a tool to improve efficiencies and correct ineffective practices," state Auditor Gary Jones said. "While the audit may be critical in nature, the end result is to propose solutions to put the entity on solid ground with recommendations to enhance its operations."

So far, the facility has received about $97 million in state funds, almost $15.7 million in federal dollars and $8 million from other sources. The figures do not include $40 million in private pledges if the state agrees to match it with an additional $40 million. During the 2012 session, the Oklahoma legislature rejected a bond proposal that would have provided additional funds, leading to the building's construction to be suspended pending additional funds.

According to the audit, which covers July 1, 2003 through June 30, 2012, the board chose the most expensive of the six plans presented by the center's architect, despite only having $5 million secured at the time.

Initially, project cost options ranged from $53.5 million to $136.1 million, but the board approved a budget plan of $169 million, the audit found.

"The board appears to have equated cost with quality, with ensuing decisions based on this premise," Jones wrote. "While this cost may have been statutorily permissible, it may or may not be regarded as reasonable by state taxpayers and officials."

The audit also showed that the board spent an additional $18.7 million on multiple outside consultants while only securing $8.3 million in outside donations prior to the 2012 legislative session.

"The board does not appear to have managed the AICCM efficiently and effectively to this point, and has yet to develop an operating budget for the museum in which future state subsidies are realistically estimated," Jones wrote. "However, a change in the attitudes of decision makers, a commitment to completion within a given budget, and a shift in the direction of the project in the short run might salvage the project in the long run. Board modifications and legislative involvement should incentivize private participation, and greater accountability and transparency should encourage more efficient operations."

The audit includes five recommendations for the board

Poarch Creeks halt casino expansion

■ The decision comes on the heels of a resolution adopted by the Inter-Tribal Council of the Five Civilized Tribes to intervene.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON

OKMULGEE, Okla. – A proposed casino expansion project is now on hold as officials from two tribes work towards a resolution to preserve a preremoval burial ground potentially threatened by construction.

Late night Oct. 16, Muscogee (Creek) Nation officials announced that the Poarch Band of Creek Indians would halt all construction efforts near Hickory Ground, the last pre-removal capital of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation National Council and home to ceremonial and burial grounds. To date, more than 60 sets of human remains have been unearthed during the expansion process, including those of seven chiefs.

The Poarch Band of Creek Indians confirmed the details of the release the following morning but declined further comment until the two tribes' leaders meet Monday afternoon (Oct. 22) during the annual convention of the National Congress of American Indians in Sacramento, Calif.

"Trying to correct something in one afternoon isn't easy," Muscogee (Creek) Nation Principal Chief George Tiger said about the upcoming meeting. "We're talking about the

Means hospitalized in Arizona

NATIVE SUN NEWS STAFF

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. – Russell Means has been admitted to a hospital in his seasonal hometown of Scottsdale.

The American Indian Movement co-founder and actor was hospitalized last week, when he announced that his esophageal cancer was no longer in remission. The 72-year-old said he learned he has "new cancer spots" on Aug. 20.

Prior to the Aug. 20 diagnosis, Means, who is Oglala Lakota, had kept his throat cancer at bay since December of last year, saying at the time that he was cancer-free.

Activist Russell Means

Initially diagnosed with esophageal cancer during the summer of 2011, he opted to forgo the conventional Western medicine methods of chemotherapy and radiation to treat his cancer, and instead chose to fight it using methods more attuned to his Lakota spirituality, including prayer.

Sources close to Means and his wife, Pearl, who is originally from the Scottsdale area, say his lungs are failing and he is in "terminal condition."

Means, whose birthday is Nov. 10, isn't expected to live much longer and doctors say they didn't expect him to have survived this long.

In an email message to Native Sun News last week, he said he has "fantastic medical teams utilizing

■ Cure of five-year-old American from flesh-eating disease propels Mohawk Kateri Tekakwitha on to sainthood

NICOLE WINFIELD

VATICAN CITY (AP) – Jake Finkbonner was so close to death after flesh-eating bacteria infected him through a cut on his lip that his parents had last rites performed and were discussing donating the 5-yearold's tiny organs.

Jake's 2006 cure from the infection was deemed medically inexplicable by the Vatican, the "miracle" needed to propel a 17th century Native American, Kateri Tekakwitha, on to sainthood. Kateri will be canonized on Sunday along with six other people, the first Native American from what is now the U.S. to receive the honor.

Jake is fully convinced, as is the Catholic Church, that the prayers his family and community offered to God through Kateri's intercession, including the placement of a Kateri relic on Jake's leg, were TAHLEQUAH, Okla. – Free workshops offering meaningful life skills and visual aid technology training to help Native Americans with impaired vision are scheduled to start on Saturday, October 27 and will be held at Northeastern State University in Tahlequah.

"I am now reading things that I haven't read in years!" exclaimed Project NATIVE participant Betty Boney. Boney recently received a machine that magnifies written pages and projects them onto a screen monitor which is set to the magnification that enables her to read text. She can also use it for family photos.

The workshops help participants remain productive and independent, which is a central goal of Project NATIVE. The unique program, the first of its kind to focus on Native Americans, is made available through the American Indian Resource Center in Tahlequah and funded through a grant from the Administration for Native Americans, U.S. Department of Health and Human

Now in its second year, this phase of Project NATIVE will provide training to up to 75 Native Americans this fall. The free program offers a short series of hands-on workshops designed to help low vision individuals with beneficial information to live more independently. The workshops also introduce the participants to current technology and equipment such as special lighted magnifiers and computer aids that help those with impaired vision see and read. After attending the workshops, Project NATIVE orders some of the equipment for participants and delivers it to their homes, all at no cost.

"People, especially older people, in the United States are losing eyesight at the rate of one person every seven minutes [according to Research to Prevent Blindness]," stated Project NATIVE Director Lillian Young, Ed.D. Americans are particularly impacted since there is a high correlation between the incidence of diabetes and loss of eyesight. This program is a great start at providing direct services to those with impaired vision, helping them get started with technology and equipment geared specifically for them and eventually to create awareness with the general public about the common issues people with low vision face every day."

"Last year we launched this program with 25 participants. We are delighted to report that our first group of participants eagerly learned about the equipment available to help them in their daily lives. They expressed sincere pleasure and gratitude for getting to know each other and they want to continue to meet as a group. The participants really became a community. This year our new participant goal is 75. Right now there is plenty of room and we encourage people to spread the word and get signed up."

If you know of someone who is visually impaired and may be interested in Project NATIVE, please ask them to call (918) 456-5581 for information. The staff at Project NATIVE is happy to answer questions and help with the application.

Trio gets prison time for investment scheme

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) – Three people convicted in a fraudulent Nebraska investment scheme have been sentenced to prison and ordered to make restitution of more than $16.6 million.

The three were sentenced last Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Lincoln.

Stella Levea and James Masat, both of Grand Island, were given eight years and a month in federal prison. Kenneth Mottin, of St. Libory, was given five years. They must serve three years of supervised release after leaving prison.

Levea and Masat were the principals of First Americans Insurance Service, which had been under investigation since a 2009 bankruptcy filing. Mottin worked for them.

First Americans, incorporated in 1980, had touted services to American Indian tribes in more than 20 states before it failed. The former insurance company isn't related to First American Corp., a Santa Ana, Calif.-based provider of title and specialty insurance and business information.

Prosecutors have said Levea, Masat and Mottin solicited investments from private lenders who were told that their money was backed by secure annuities.

Instead of buying annuities, the three used the money to support their business and personal expenses, prosecutors said.

Nebraska Attorney General Jon Bruning compared First Americans' actions to a Ponzi scheme in which investors were promised unusually high returns and early investors were paid out with money from later investors.

In court Wednesday, Levea and Masat apologized and expressed regret.

"I would love to turn back the clock," Levea said.

Masat's attorney, Tom Dahlk, blamed the 2008 financial crisis for the Grand Island company's problems and said things went out of control there.

"It never should have happened," Dahlk said.

Levea's attorney, Clarence Mock, and Dahlk urged the judge to sentence their clients to house arrest, community service and five years of probation and order them to earmark half their salaries for the restitution.

Tribal court disputed in Grand Canyon bridge fight

■ The federal district court repeatedly has said that the tribal court has the first right to hear the case.

TERRY COLLINS Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - The jurisdiction of a Native American tribal court was challenged Friday by the developer of a popular glass bridge over the Grand Canyon who has been locked in a multi-million dollar contract dispute with an Arizona-based tribe.

David Jin's lawyer, Troy Eid, told a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the Las Vegas businessman should not have to fight his legal battles in the Hualapai tribal court system, saying it lacks authority to hear the case.

Eid also said the tribal court is not giving his client a fair shot to protect his financial stake.

Jeffrey Gross, an attorney for the tribe, denied the allegations and told the panel that Jin signed a contract allowing the operation of the Skywalk to be governed by Hualapai law. Gross argued that Jin first must exhaust his legal options in tribal court before turning to federal

The fight between Jin and the tribe could be worth tens of millions of dollars and stems from a disagreement over management fees and an incomplete visitor center.

The dispute prompted Hualapai leaders to sever Jin's contract. They say he is owed $11 million for fair market value of the Skywalk. Jin, however, says his rights are worth closer to $100 million. He has alleged in lawsuits that his constitutional rights are being violated.

The Grand Canyon Skywalk extends in a horseshoe shape from the canyon's edge on tribal land in western Arizona, giving visitors a view of the Colorado River 4,000 feet below. Jin invested $30 million to build it.

It's unclear when the panel will rule in the dispute over jurisdiction.

The judges said they understood the claims and are aware of the financial stakes. They also said they realize both parties are anxious for a resolution.

The judges also asked Gross halfheartedly if they would see the parties back again for another possible round of appeals.

"Or not," Gross said. "Because we don't know what's going to happen in tribal court and that's the whole point of exhausting the administrative remedies in tribal court because that process may prevent us from coming back."

There is an exception to exhausting tribal court remedies if Jin's attorneys can prove that the tribal court – not the Tribal Council - has acted in bad faith. He's been unsuccessful so far.

The federal district court repeatedly has said that the tribal court has the first right to hear the case.

The two sides don't agree either on an arbiter's decision to award Jin more than $28 million in the contract dispute. The tribe pulled out of the proceeding by the American Arbitration Association once it cut Jin out of the contract.

Projects teaching children to speak Native language at younger age

So far, parents say they are seeing noticeable differences in their children.

KRISTI EATON Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) - When Peter Hill's daughter was born two years ago, he made a conscious decision to only speak Lakota to her.

Hill, who is fluent in Lakota after learning it as a second language, said he wanted Charlotte to learn the American Indian language from the start.

"By virtue of that ... in terms of understanding, (she is) completely and equally fluent in both English and Lakota," the proud father and Lakota instructor said.

Now the Pine Ridge S.D., man plans to start an immersion day care to get other infants speaking fluent Lakota early. His is part of a wave of projects targeting younger children in an effort to revitalize the language of Lakota, which is spoken primarily by Sioux Native Americans in North and South Dakota.

Fewer than 6,000 people speak the American Indian language of Lakota fluently - less than 14 percent of the Lakota population in the Dakotas - and the average age of a Lakota speaker is 60.

"My hope is if we can make it successful then other people that want to do the same thing can follow the same model," said Hill, who initially will focus on infants from 15 to 20 months old.

in-home Lakota Immersion Childcare is set to open at the end of October or beginning of November on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in southwestern South Dakota. Hill's mission is to immerse children in the language as infants so that Lakota becomes their first language rather than a second language.

It's a lofty goal but something that parents want, even if they cannot speak the language fluently themselves. There's already a waiting list of 10 children.

Hill previously worked at the Red Cloud Indian School on the Pine Ridge reservation. He's searching for another caregiver besides him, preferably a woman who is fluent in Lakota and has experience working with children.

He describes the ideal candidate as "someone who is young enough that they have the energy and the charisma to sort of handle all these toddlers but also old enough that they are a ... genuinely fluent speaker."

The plan it to expand the program to include elementaryschoolcurriculum as the initial children reach school age. The early childhood component will be retained permanently.

Other initiatives are under way to start teaching Lakota at a younger age. Twenty episodes of the Berenstain

Bears cartoon have been translated into Lakota, and an app geared toward kids learning the language has been created.

And on the Standing Rock reservation, which straddles the North Dakota-South Dakota border, an immersion nest for 3-year-olds called the Kampus Kids Lakota Immersion program started in September.

Project director Sacheen Whitetail Cross said the program uses basic earlychildhood teaching methods and a concept called total physical response, which uses action to teach. For example, Whitetail Cross said, students will use the language to describe their actions of passing out utensils at meal times or brushing their teeth.

The immersion nest is part of the Lakota Language Education Action Program, which is aimed at trying to increase the number of young teachers capable of teaching Lakota as a second language. The Action Program offers tuition, room and board to qualified language students at the University of South Dakota or Sitting Bull College on the Standing Rock reservation. Once completed, students are required to teach Lakota in a classroom for the same amount of time they received funding.

So far, immersion nest parents say they are seeing noticeable differences in their children. Mary Wilson and her husband had been trying on their own to teach Lakota to their daughter, Tiwakanna Mentz, but the 3-year-old showed little interest in learning it. The Fort Yates, N.D., couple enrolled Tiwakanna in the day care and now she's surrounded by other 3-year-olds, being taught by a fluent Lakota speaker and learning new words and expressions every "Almost immediately her attitude about it has changed and she sort of accepts that it's something that people use other than her mom or her dad," Wilson said.

Another parent, Stephanie Yellow Hammer, said she is constantly surprised by her son Karsen's growing vocabulary. The Fort Yates woman said the 3-year-old knows how to ask for things in Lakota without repeating someone else's words.

Yellow Hammer, who does not know the language but grew up with her father speaking it, said keeping the language alive is paramount for the Lakota culture.

"A lot of our culture is oral so without our language we would have no culture. No songs and prayers for ceremonies and powwows. No way to pass on stories, traditions, beliefs values," she said.

as it moves forward: develop a clear comprehensive budget; enhance legislative oversight via NACEA independence; modify the board membership to include people with more museum administration experience; differentiate the NACEA board responsibilities from those of the museum foundation's board and develop a realistic business plan.

"Our audit found no lack of dedication to the project from the board," Jones wrote. "On the contrary, they show an enthusiastic passion for the mission. The vision of the American Indian Cultural Center and Museum (AICCM) as a world-class facility, one that will provide a comprehensive history of our native citizens, is a source of great pride and accomplishment for board members. However, the same pride and desire to construct such a multisensory masterpiece resulted unrealistic expectations from the board and legislature

Attempts to reach NACEA chairman Gov. Bill Anoatubby were unsuccessful.

Fallin's office released a statement on the audit late Wednesday.

"Moving forward, it is important for the legislature, NACEA leadership and all stakeholders to work together to ensure that this project, which the state began seven years ago, is completed and can open as quickly as possible to attracting visitors and earning revenue. The governor continues to feel that a halfbuilt facility on prime location that taxpayers are still paying for is a wasted opportunity to enhance tour ism and economic development. The state needs to look at all possible ways to complete it."

remains of our forefathers and foremothers. It's hard to say whether anything will come anything out of Monday's meeting other than continuing the dialogue."

The decision comes on the heels of a resolution adopted by the Inter-Tribal Council of the Five Civilized Tribes to intervene. On Oct. 12, officials from the Cherokee, Chickasaw, Choctaw, Muscogee (Creek) and Seminole tribes voted unanimously at the RiverSpirit Event Center to stop the casino expansion project and protect the sacred site.

"The irony is that the Inter-Tribal Council (of the Five Civilized Tribes) normally does not get involved in disputes between tribes," Tiger said. "The other tribal leaders looked at it from the perspective of the site's sacredness and saw that this could happen to almost any tribe in the country."

Announced in July, the $246 million expansion project includes plans for a 20-story hotel with 285 rooms, a full-scale casino with more than 2,500 electronic gaming machines, a resort-style pool and space for live entertainment. Scheduled to open around New Year's Day 2014, the expansion would create about 1,000 jobs for the Wetumpka., Ala., area.

The only federally-recognized tribe in Alabama, the 3,000-citizen Poarch Band of Creek Indians also operates casinos in Montgomery, Ala., and Atmore, Ala.

responsible for his survival.

Jake, now 12 and an avid basketball player and crosscountry runner, will be present at the canonization, along with hundreds of members of his own Lummi tribe from northwest Washington state and indigenous communities across the U.S. and Canada who have converged on Rome to honor one of their own. It's a ceremony the Catholic Church hopes will encourage Native Americans to keep to their Christian faith amid continued resentment among some that Catholicism was imposed on them by colonial-era missionaries centuries ago.

"I believe everybody has a purpose on this earth," Jake's mother Elsa Finkbonner said this week soon after the family arrived in Rome for the ceremony. "I think this Sunday Jake will define his purpose, and that's to make Kateri a saint."

Jake, a poised, lanky kid who just got his braces off, seems perfectly at ease with his role in the whole thing, gracious and grateful to the doctors who performed 29 surgeries to save his life and reconstruct his face.

"It's a really special thing," Jake told The Associated Press, flanked by his parents on a hotel terrace sofa. "We've never been to Rome, and especially meeting the pope? It'll be an experience of a lifetime."

Besides Kateri, Pope Benedict XVI declared another American a saint Sunday, Mother Marianne Cope, a 19th century Franciscan nun from Utica, New York – near where Kateri lived two centuries earlier – who cared for lepers exiled to Hawaii's Kalaupapa Peninsula. Another new saint is Pedro Calungsod, a Filipino teenager who was killed in 1672 along with his Jesuit missionary priest by Natives resisting their conversion efforts.

The Catholic Church creates saints to hold up models for the faithful, convinced that their lives – even lived hundreds of years ago – are still relevant to today's Catholics. The complicated saint-making procedure requires that the Vatican certify a "miracle" was performed through the intercession of the candidate – a medically inexplicable cure that can be directly linked to the prayers offered by the faithful. One miracle is needed for beatification, a second for canonization.

In Jake's case, Kateri was already an important figure for Catholics in the Lummi tribe, of which his father Donny is a member. A carved wooden statue sits in the church on the Lummi reservation near Bellingham, Washington, 25 miles (40 kilometers) south of the Canadian border, where Jake's grandparents worshipped and where Donny remembers being told of Kateri's story as a child.

Known as the "Lily of the Mohawks," Kateri was born in 1656 to a pagan Iroquois father and an Algonquin Christian mother in what is today upstate New York. Her parents and only brother died when she was 4 during a smallpox epidemic that left her badly scarred and with impaired eyesight. She went to live with her uncle, a Mohawk, and was baptized Catholic by Jesuit missionaries. But she was ostracized and persecuted by other natives for her faith, and she died in what is now Canada when she was 24.

The Rev. Tim Sauer was the Finkbonner's parish priest in Ferndale, Washington – as well as the pastor on the Lummi reservation – when Jake cut his lip while playing basketball on Saturday, Feb. 11, 2006. The necrotizing fasciitis bacteria that entered Jake's body through the cut immediately began spreading, and by the time Sauer arrived at Seattle Children's Hospital where Jake was airlifted two days later, Donny and Elsa Finkbonner were preparing to bury their son.

"At that point, we were desperate, and we were looking for anyone's help that would help our son," Donny said, recalling how doctors had said there wasn't much else for them to do but pray, and that they had come to terms with the possibility that their oldest of three children might not survive the week.

"We wanted Jake back with us desperately," he recalled. "But we were willing to give him up" to God

Sauer, who performed the last rites ritual on Jake that Wednesday – four days after he cut his lip – said he immediately urged the Finkbonners and the congregation back on the reservation to pray to Kateri, thinking their shared Native American heritage and scarring diseases were relevant.

He said he did so first and foremost to save Jake, but also because he thought that Native Americans could use a "boost of faith" if one of their own were held up as a saint. Indigenous Catholics in the U.S. and Canada, he said, increasingly find themselves ostracized and criticized within their communities for embracing and retaining the Christian faith spread by imperial colonizers.

"There's been a growing sense of a return to Native American spirituality on reservations, which are good things, but at the same time along with that has been some criticism that native people should let go of Christianity because that was brought by the 'white man' and should go back to their own native culture entirely," he said.

He said Kateri represents a perfect model for indigenous Catholics today, someone who resisted the ostracization of fellow natives and kept the faith.

For the devoutly Catholic Finkbonners, prayer was all they had left after Jake's doctors tried unsuccessfully for two weeks to stop the bacteria's spread. Jake was in a drug-induced coma for most of that time and says he doesn't remember much, a few memories "here and there, not all of it."

"Every day it would seem the news would get worse," Donny recalled. "I remember the last day that we met with the whole group of doctors, Elsa didn't even want to hear. She just got behind me and was holding on."

But rather than bad news, the doctors said the infection had stopped. "It was like a volcano that was erupting, and they opened him up and it was gone. It had stopped. It was a pretty amazing day," Donny said.

It took the Finkbonners several years to realize that the turning point had come a day after a friend of the family – a nun named after Kateri – had visited them in the hospital, prayed with them and placed a relic of the soon-to-be saint on Jake's leg.

"It took years for us to look at the calendar and recall that this is the day she came, this is the day she put the relic on, this is the day the infection stopped," Elsa said. "As the years of the investigation have gone on, little bits and pieces of puzzle seem to fall into place, and that's where it all makes sense now as to why Jake's story turned out so big."

Jake, who bears the scars of his ordeal, seems all too happy to be the center of attention this weekend. But he seems keen to move on from his celebrity. He has basketball tryouts when he gets back home and his studies – he wants to be a plastic surgeon when he grows up. "Kateri was placed on this earth, and she has interceded on many people's behalf, she has defined her purpose," Elsa said. "I think Jake has bigger, larger plans in store for him."

COMMENTARY

Quantum vs. descendency, an egg best left unscrambled

S.E. RUCKMAN

A recent review of the old executive order of Affirmative Action reminded me of a scene out of Frankenstein, where the mad scientist (read what you will) tries to inject new life into an empty shell. I hate to make this comparison, but with President John F. Kennedy gone nearly half of a century it is one of the last breaths of his administration.

I was never a particular fan of horror movies, but it seems appropriate to make this comparison as we hover around Halloween and right before we swing into full Thanksgiving gratitude mode.

Like most things in the bigger scope of American existence, things tend to affect Indian Country by osmosis. That is to say, if it's big enough of an issue, we may feel a breeze but mostly we just hear about the wind rather than feel it directly on most mainstream issues. This is sometimes is a good thing.

The Supreme Court's recent review on Affirmative Action was derided in one venue not by questioning the Kennedy era ideal, but rather heckling the system underneath it. A Lone Star teenager was the anti-Affirmative Action poster child by questioning Texas' standing tenets of this policy and the use of it when regarding entry into the University Of Texas (UT).

Race simply cannot be a reliable determinant in certain venues, like education. In Indian tribes, however, it is entirely about race. Let's weave two seemingly unrelated issues together.

So I began to read about Affirmative Action presidential order; like Law-Lite) that was designed to "level the playing field" for minorities when seeking position/entry into some entities. It is still a fact that minorities face many sociological limitations when competing directly with the

As a woman and a minority, I favor Affirmative Action. It was the invisible mound of dirt below home plate that allowed the minorities (and admittedly me) to step up and bat credibly. Nowhere did it smack of anything un-American, in fact, it felt seriously American—to make things appear equal.

I felt a bit wobbly reading through the related stories. Maybe I was ready to change my mind. Perhaps outdated (albeit concepts meaning) should be allowed all the dignity of a legal death. It is in this light (not lite) that I consider the egg that I like to leave unscrambled: blood quantum versus descendancy.

Many smaller tribes today are facing the decision to lower their blood quantum requirement. Without a change, their children will not belong to the tribe that the parents belong. It is the cold conscription of blood Descendancy proponents argue that tribes alone should get to set the criteria to say who is Native.

So being lineally related to a higher blood person is a reasonable substitute, descendancy proponents say.

Some contend blood quantum (a practice rightfully ascribed to the federal government) Natives are being slowly phased out as a people. Lowering the degree to a fractionized margin for enrollment could be the answer. I tossed this around a bit. Then it hit me that descendency might be the tribal version of Affirmative

Ironically, rather than leveling the playing field, it lowers the playing field (or blood requirement) for more to bat or in this case to enroll in a tribe. The more people there are in our in respective tribes then the danger of being extinct is momentarily circumvented. This is a provocative thought.

Another solution is to allow those with a half or more blood quantum to claim fullblood status in their tribe (decided by vote) and notch up their offspring's blood degree as well. Blood quantum stays sterling here and ethnic annihilation is held at bay.

Descendency does seem to be the trump card for tribes, that tactic by which it can hang onto a tribal designation and maintain its sovereignty. For other tribes, it's an ace they don't mind keeping up their sleeve.

Indian voting rights and the restricting of voting

Around the Campfire

DR. DEAN CHAVERS © COPYRIGHT 2012

There has been no Indian voting rights act, and no congressional hearings or testimony on such a bill. But as I demonstrated in my book "Racism in Indian Country," there are many conspiracies among non-Indians on or near reservations to keep Indian people from registering to vote and to keep them from voting. There have been dozens of lawsuits filed against county voter registrars, county commissioners and state officials over denying Indians the right to vote.

When they returned from World War II, many Indian veterans were upset that they still could not vote. They had fought and died for their country, only to be denied this basic constitutional right when they got home. They began to lobby Congress and the state legislatures to give them suffrage rights. They had been exposed to the world outside the reservation, some for the first time, and had started to learn that they had been cheated out of many things, such as adequate housing, an adequate education, decent jobs, and the right to vote.

They found they could not get loans to buy cattle, to start businesses, to build houses on reservations, and to buy cars

Indians could still not vote in New Mexico and Arizona as of 1948. The denial of the right to vote was in the constitution of the State of New Mexico. It stated that Indians living on reservations could not vote in state and federal elections. The BIA had started to push to change such laws before the war started, but had gotten sidetracked by the war.

When Miguel Trujillo, from Isleta Pueblo and a recent veteran of the Marine Corps during World War II, went to register to vote, he was told by the county registrar, Eloy Garley, that he could not register since he was an Indian living on a reservation.

Trujillo was incensed. He brought suit against the county registrar and won. (Trujillo v. Garley) Felix Cohen, who had written the definitive book on Indian law, the "Handbook of Federal Indian Law," was the attorney for Trujillo. Finally, in 1948, Indians in New Mexico could vote for the first time. Trujillo and Cohen became friends and worked on other issues of civil rights in New Mexico and in the South.

The case also debunked the myth that Indians did not pay taxes. The only taxes Indians did not pay, the court said, was taxes on the land the government held in trust for them. They had to pay sales taxes, income taxes, and all other taxes.

In that same year, a lawsuit by another Indian veteran, Frank Harrison, in Arizona, let Indians vote for the first time in that state. (Harrison and Austin v. Leveen) Harrison was a member of the Mohave Tribe. He had tried to register to vote in Maricopa County, Arizona, and been denied by the County Recorder, Roger Leveen. The ubiquitous Felix Cohen was also one of the attorneysinthislandmarkcase. The NCAI, the Department of Justice, and the Department of the Interior also filed amicus curiae (friends of the court) briefs in this case. Thereafter, it was clear in all states of the union that Indians could vote in tribal, state, local, and federal elections. Utah, however, did not get around to removing this barrier to Indian voting for another two decades.

The other states that had restricted Indian voting fell in line—to a limited extent. They continued to restrict Indian voting by refusing to allow roving registrars, by charging the poll tax, and by gerrymandering Indian votes to deny Indians the right to vote and to run for office.

But the legacy of Indians being denied the right to vote is still strong. Most Indians are either not interested in national issues, or are afraid that if they vote in national elections they will somehow lose their membership in their tribe. The latter is not true. And many barriers still exist to keep Indians from registering and voting. They include having one single election place in a county, requiring voters to travel from their reservation to the county seat to register to vote, refusing to allow roving registrars to register voters, and holding elections in places hostile to Indian voters.

Indian people have only slowly started, since 1980, to vote in increased numbers in national elections. The National Indian Youth Council (NIYC) of Albuquerque found in surveys in the 1980s that only 15% to 20% of Indians in Arizona and New Mexico were registered to vote in state and national elections.

In most states, Indians are under 10% of the eligible voters. In only three states are Indians more than 10% of the total population. But in some cases, the Indian vote has been critical to the success of candidates. The Indian vote defeated the reelection of Slade Gorton, the anti-Indian former Attorney General of Washington State. Gorton was the lead attorney for sport fishermen who lost the case in the Boldt decision (U. S. v. Washington) that gave Indians the right to half the salmon and steelhead catch in the state. He ran for the Senate on an anti-Indian platform and won, but lost for re-election when Indians mobilized against him.

Gary Johnson (Republican), governor of New Mexico from 1995 to 2003, won both elections with the help of the Indian vote and donations from tribal casinos. His opponent in the first election, Bruce King (Democrat), had waffled on support for tribal casinos during his third term as governor. This lost King almost all the Indian support. The Indian vote, which was about 6% of the total, put Johnson over the top in his first election in 1994. His opponent in the second election, my friend Martin Chavez, was the Democratic mayor of Albuquerque. Marty's lack of spirited support for tribal casinos also cost him the election; Johnson won 54% to 46% in 1998. If Marty had had 3% more votes from Indians and 2% from Hispanics, who are one of the main customers of the tribal casinos, Marty would have been governor.

Larry Echohawk, the recent Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs, was the first Indian to win an election for statewide office. Denise Juneau, who is Blackfeet and Mandan, won the election in 2008 for Superintendent of Public Instruction in Montana. Denise is the second Indian person in the history of the U. S. to win such a statewide seat. She obviously won with to support the unsuccessful mostly non-Indian votes, since Indians constitute less than 10% of the voting population in the state. It helped that she is an attorney and a former school teacher who paid her dues learning the system. She ran a spirited campaign, and defeated a well-known opponent. Denise was one of our scholarship students for her Master's degree in English from Harvard and for her law degree from the University of Montana.

Indians overwhelmingly for Barack Obama for President in 2008, and probably added one or two percent to his election margin. With up to a million Indians voting nationwide, they could swing the margin in a close election, something numerous Indian voting advocates have pushed for years.

For the first time in 1980 there was an active campaign within the Democratic Party to have a voice in the election for President. Billie Masters, a Cherokee from California, headed the campaign.

There were a dozen and a half Indian delegates at the convention. In 1984 there were 28 Indian delegates to the national convention of the Democratic Party. In 1988 there 51 Indian delegates, and in 1992 there were 62. In 1984, Roger Jourdain, Ada Deer, Ruby Ludwig, Verna Wood and I headed First Americans for Mondale. We had 28 Indian delegates at the Democratic convention, raised $32,000, and registered 30,000 new Indian voters. The Democrat Mondale lost to the Republican Ronald Reagan.

In 1988, a group of people put together an Indian effort campaign of Michael Dukakis. He lost to George H. W. Bush. In 1992, attorneys Kevin Gover and Cate Stetson of Albuquerque headed First Americans for Clinton, and repeated their efforts in 1996. Ada Deer headed the BIA in Clinton's first term. Mr. Gover headed the BIA in the second Clinton term.

There are now about 85 Indian elected officials in the US. They are state senators and representatives, local sheriffs, county commissioners, and city council members. They have more authority than at any time in Indian history to influence budgets and policies. But the Indian vote is still too

Okla. voters to decide affirmative action future

SEAN MURPHY Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) - While the nation's highest court ponders the use of race in college admissions, Oklahoma voters will decide next month whether to prohibit any affirmative action programs in state government.

State Question 759, a Republicanbacked proposal approved by Oklahoma lawmakers last year, would specifically ban any programs government employment, education or contracting that give preferred treatment based on race, gender, ethnicity or national origin. Supporters say affirmative action programs, first implemented in the 1960s to provide equal opportunities for minorities and women, are no longer needed, while opponents maintain racism and sexism still exists and that eliminating such programs would move the state backward.

"The only way we're going to get past racism and get people not to see the color difference is to get our government to lead by example," said state Sen. Rob Johnson, R-Kingfisher, who sponsored the proposal in the Legislature.

Ryan Kiesel, the director of the Oklahoma chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the group opposes the ban and questioned whether Republicans placed the question on the ballot in part to help drive white, conservative voters to

"You have to wonder if politics are behind the motivation to put this on the ballot," Kiesel said. "I think this is an unnecessary state question. I think the negative impacts of it are much greater than any of the purported positives that the supporters are putting on the table."

The ballot question in Oklahoma comes as the U.S. Supreme Court considers a case involving a white Texas student, Abigail Fisher, who contends she was discriminated against when the University of Texas did not offer her a spot in 2008 because of its program that considers race in college admissions. The high court, which is expected to rule on the case next summer, heard arguments in the case Oct. 10.

But in Oklahoma, state officials say racial preference programs like those in place at the University of Texas already have been abolished and that passage of the state question here will have little effect, other than to eliminate a handful of scholarships at public universities that target women and minorities. The question specifically allows exemptions for programs in place because of existing court orders or consent decrees or when affirmative action is needed to keep or obtain federal funds.

"Our practices will stay the same regardless," said Shelley Reeves, a spokeswoman for the Office of Management and Enterprise Services, the state agency that oversees both state hiring and contracting. "In practice, we're comfortable with the hiring practices that we employ in providing the state with a diverse workforce ... and based on the way that we interpret the resolution, there would be no change in the bidding practice."

The ballot measure in Oklahoma is based on similar proposals that already have passed in California, Michigan, Nebraska, Washington and, most recently, Arizona in 2010.

The measures have been spearheaded by Ward Connerly, the founder and president of the nonprofitAmerican Civil Rights Institute, who argues that the time for affirmative action programs, implemented in the 1960s under President John F. Kennedy, has ended.

"I think that the initiative in Oklahoma is one whose time has come," said Connerly, who recently visited with civic organizations in Oklahoma City to build support for the proposal.

Most of the studies into how these measures affect states come from California and Washington, which put the bans in place in the 1990s. According to a 2012 study by the Henderson Center for Social Justice at the University of California's Berkeley School of Law, state contracts to women and minorityowned businesses in California dropped by more than 50 percent after the affirmative action ban was implemented.

The study also notes that data from Washington shows a similar decline in transportation construction awards after that state passed its ban in 1998 and that there was a dramatic drop in minority applicants at the University of Washington. The number of African American, Hispanic and Native American students applying to elite law schools in several states that banned affirmative action, including California and Washington, also declined, the study notes.

And while those impacts may not be felt in a state like Oklahoma, which doesn't use racial or gender preferences in college admissions or contracting, the proposal could still have negative implications for race relations in the state, said Michael Sumner, who helped author the 2012

"One of the things we've found in our research is that people become afraid of both violating the law accidentally as well as just becoming afraid to talk about race and ethnicity and gender," Sumner said. "Part of this chilling impact is that it creates an environment where even bringing up these issues at all, people become fearful."

Native candidates on ballot in several state races

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

OKLAHOMA CITY — Races for the Oklahoma legislature are reaching into Indian Country.

According to the 2010 census, about 10 percent of the voters in House District 29 are Native American. However, residents in west Tulsa County and most of Creek County will be choosing between two tribal citizens to represent them at the state Capitol for the second consecutive election.

House Majority Whip and Muscogee (Creek) Nation citizen Skye McNiel (R-Bristow) is a six-year incumbent. Her opponent, David Narcomey, belongs to the Seminole Nation and is a former regional director of the American Indian Movement.

"This speaks well for Natives," she said about her district's all-Indian ballot. "This shows that we're out there, we're productive and we want to contribute."

Narcomey, who also ran against McNiel in 2010, could not be reached for comment.

Headquartered in Shawnee, Okla., the Citizen Potawatomi Nation will have at least one new representative at the capitol in 2013 alongside Veterans and Military Affairs Committee chairman Rep. Paul Wesselhoft (R-Moore). With no Democratic challengers, Mark McBride defeated three other Republicans this summer to represent District 53 in Cleveland County, adjacent to Wesselhoft's district.

Fellow Citizen Potawatomi Nation citizen Jason Smalley, a Republican from Stroud, is on the ballot in District 32, which covers Lincoln County and a portion of Logan County.

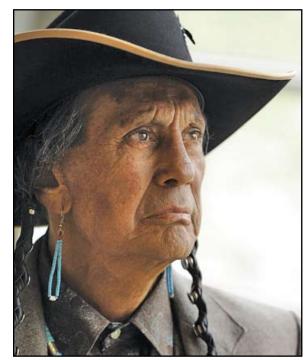

Citizens from other tribes are also trying to become first-term representatives. Further east, Democrat Shawna Keller, who is Cherokee and Choctaw, is running for State House District 23, which covers part of east Tulsa County and western Rogers County, including Catoosa. The seat was vacated earlier this year by the death of long time legislator Sue Tibbs.

The district also straddles the boundary between the Cherokee Nation and Muscogee (Creek)

Longtime activist Russell Means dies at 72

Activist Russell Means

DIRK LAMMERS and KRISTI EATON Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) – Russell Means spent a lifetime as a modern — American Indian warrior. He railed against broken treaties, fought for the return of stolen land and even took up arms against the federal government.

A onetime leader of the American Indian Movement, he called national attention to the plight of impoverished tribes and often lamented the waning of Indian culture. After leaving the movement in the 1980s, the handsome, braided activist was still a cultural presence, appearing in several movies.

Means, who died Oct. 22 from throat cancer at age 72, helped lead the 1973 uprising at Wounded Knee – a bloody confrontation that raised America's awareness about the struggles of Indians and gave rise to a wider protest movement that lasted for the rest of the decade.

Before AIM, there were few national advocates for American Indians. Means was one of the first to emerge. He sought to restore Indians' pride in their culture and to challenge a government that had paid little attention to tribes in generations. He was also one of the first to urge sports teams to do away with Indian names and mascots.

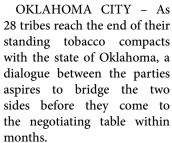

"No one except Hollywood stars and very rich Texans wore Indian

Nations unite against domestic violence

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

PONCA CITY, Okla. – For a few hours Friday, Standing Bear Park was awash in purple.

In honor of Domestic Violence Awareness Month, the Kaw Nation, Otoe-Missouria Tribe, Osage Nation, Pawnee Nation, Ponca Tribe and Tonkawa Tribe co-sponsored an awareness walk at the park on Ponca City's south side.

"We wanted to get together and do something," said Dawn Roe with the Tonkawa Tribe's domestic violence program. "Ponca City's domestic violence office hosts 'Walk a Mile in Her Shoes.' We wanted to do something similar, but make it more traditional so more men, tribal leaders and victims could get involved."

Ponca City is within the jurisdictional areas of the Osage Nation and the Ponca Tribe of Oklahoma. The other four co-host tribes are all headquartered within 40 miles of the Kay County community.

More than 100 attendees lapped the park Friday afternoon. As a drum circle played a prayer song near the entrance to the Standing Bear Museum and Cultural Center, walkers released purple helium-filled balloons in honor of domestic violence victims.

"This is even more special for us because one of our victims was admitted to the hospital last night in critical condition," said Janette Rayna, coordinator for the Ponca Tribe's domestic violence program.

Launched earlier this year, Rayna said her program has already worked with more than 60 victims and hopes to make this an annual event.

According to the Oklahoma State Department of Health, 49 percent of all women statewide and 40 percent of men will experience some form of domestic violence within their lifetime. Nationally, Native Americans are more than twice as likely than any other racial

Oklahoma tribe on track to buy La., Miss. casinos

JEFF AMY Associated Press

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) – An Oklahoma Indian tribe is moving forward with buying the DiamondJacks casinos in Bossier City, La., and Vicksburg, Miss

Global Gaming Solutions was the only entity that sought to buy the casinos in the bankruptcy process, averting a possible auction among multiple bidders. The unit of the Chickasaw Nation of Oklahoma plans to pay $27.5 million in cash and $97.5 million in new debt to top-level lenders of current owner Legends Gaming.

Legends filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization in Shreveport, La., in July.

Court papers show Legends has $105 million in assets. But even after an earlier bankruptcy, it owes lenders $298 million, almost all secured debt.

Wilmington Trust, a Delaware institution, leads a syndicate holding $181 million in secured debt with the first claim on Legends assets. A lawyer for Wilmington Trust wrote in court papers that lenders negotiated the sale before the July 31 bankruptcy filing and that most first-lien lenders agreed to avoid sabotaging the sale.

Wells Fargo & Co. leads another syndicate that holds $115 million in debt.

The new owners won't be able to complete the purchase until a bankruptcy judge approves. A reorganization plan isn't due to the court until late November.

The Chickasaws own 13 casinos in Oklahoma's competitive Indian gambling market. Their Global Gaming unit bought Remington Park Racing and Casino in Oklahoma City in 2010 and an ownership stake in Lone Star Park in Grand FLAGSTAFF, Ariz. (AP) -Months after the federal Indian Health Service said it was finalizing a policy that would make emergency contraception more accessible to American Indian women, advocates say they're still waiting. And in the meantime, Native women face a patchwork of policies at hospitals and clinics that don't always ensure timely access to the medication.

Kickapoo ask Kan. gov. to help with water

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) – The chairman of the Kickapoo Indian tribe in northeast Kansas wants Gov. Sam Brownback to intervene in its fight for a reservoir.

The Topeka Capital-Journal reports that Steve Cadue was in Topeka on Friday to receive a proclamation honoring Kansas tribes.

While there, Cadue handed out a letter addressed to Brownback asking for help in the tribe's long-running battle with the Nemaha Brown Watershed Board for a reservoir. The Kickapoo have sought to build the Plum Creek Dam for decades to ease water shortages on their reservation.

The Kickapoo and the water board came to an agreement in 1998 to build the dam, but landowners won't sell their property to make way for the project and board members have declined to use eminent domain to enforce the agreement.

C&A Tribes get $15 million energy settlement

CONCHO, Okla. – The Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes will receive a multimillion dollar severance agreement from one of the country's largest natural gas producers.

On Friday, a representative from the one of the Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes' two claimant governments announced that it would receive $15,570,288.90 from Oklahoma City-based Chesapeake Energy Corporation in severance taxes, penalties and interest on several leases held by the tribes that had not been paid out.

According to Lisa Liebl, spokeswoman for Janice Prairie Chief-Boswell's administration, the severance funds will go towards tribal programs, including education, public health and law enforcement. Under the Cheyenne and Arapaho General Revenue and Taxation Act of 1998, the money is not eligible for per capita payments.

The announcement came soon after a hearing date was set in Custer County District Court in the tribes' civil case with the First Bank and Trust of Clinton, Okla. Due to the on-going leadership dispute within Cheyenne and Arapaho tribes, their accounts with that bank are under court supervision. A hearing is scheduled for Nov. 19 at 9:30 a.m. at the Custer County Courthouse in Arapaho, Okla., on an application from one faction's legislature to access the funds on behalf of three tribal programs.

Lumbees concerned about rule on eagle feathers

PEMBROKE, N.C. (AP) – Member of the Lumbee Tribe of North Carolina are upset over a new federal rule making it illegal for tribe members to carry eagle feathers.

The Fayetteville Observer reports that a Justice Department rule that took effect last month only allows members of federally recognized tribes to have the feathers of birds protected by federal law.

Tribal attorney Ed Brooks says the policy is unconstitutional and attacks tribes that are not recognized by the federal government. He says the Justice Department cannot create a policy that singles out one tribal people over another.

The tribal council has passed a resolution saying the tribe should be allowed to have eagle feathers. The Lumbee Tribe is recognized by the state but does not have the full federal recognition.

Court upholds Navajo hiring rules at Ariz. mines

GALLUP, N.M. (AP) – A federal judge has upheld hiring preferences at northeastern Arizona coal mines that require the mining company to favor members of the Navajo tribe.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick's ruling may end a decade-long battle that pitted the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission against Peabody Western Coal Co. Sedwick is based in Alaska but heard the case in Phoenix.

The EEOC alleged in its 2001 lawsuit that contracts requiring hiring preferences for Navajos seeking work on Peabody's reservation mines discriminate against members of other tribes. The federal anti-workplace discrimination agency argued that American Indians as a group could be offered preference but not Navajos specifically. EEOC sought to void federally approved lease provisions on two mine sites requiring Navajo preference and to invalidate the Navajo Preference in Employment Act.

The Gallup Independent reports a Navajo Department of Justice statement said the Oct. 18 ruling backs its position that the practice is legal.

that the practice is legal.

The Navajo Nation and U.S. Interior Department were eventually brought into the original suit. Both Peabody and the Interior "unequivocally and steadfastly supported Navajo tribal preference for on-reservation employers," according to DOJ.

"The Nation, Peabody, and the Department of the Interior all explained that tribal preference in employment for on-reservation employers is not prohibited national origin discrimination, as the EEOC alleged, but is instead a political preference which falls outside the scope of federal equal employment opportunity law. And this is what the district court ruled."

"We are disappointed," EEOC regional attorney Mary Jo O'Neill said Friday. "We disagree with the decision and we are considering our options, including appeal."

LISA SNELL | NATIVE AMERICAN TIMES together against Domestic Violence

Marilyn Cornell, Tonkawa tribal citizen, was one of the first to arrive for the Six Nations Walking together against Domestic Violence event, Oct. 26 at Standing Bear Park, Ponca City. She got a free t-shirt and purple awareness bracelet - but most importantly, she said, she was there in support of a loved one.

group to experience domestic violence, often at the hands of a non-Native perpetrator.

"This is going on in our communities," Roe said. "We have to get the word out there that this is not traditional. This is not OK."

For one of the host tribes, Friday's event comes as its domestic violence program prepares to close its doors.

The Kaw Nation, headquartered in Kaw City, Okla., was unable to secure grant funding through the U.S. Department of Justice's Office on Violence Against Women to keep its domestic violence program running after Dec. 31.

"Out of the six tribes in our area, only two were able to receive grant money," program coordinator Rima Bellmard-Mathews said. "It's competitive and it shouldn't be, especially if there is a demonstrated need in an area." Bellmard-Mathews said her office is searching for and applying for more grants, but none will provide funding until April 2013 at the earliest. She doesn't know for sure what will happen to victims who would normally go to her Ponca City office after the grant runs out.

"A lot of it will just depend on where they live and who they make contact with," she said. "We'll do what we can to shuffle victims to other tribes' programs in the area to try to get them the help they need."

Nation, prompting Keller to reach out to both tribes.

"I've been lucky to get support from both the Cherokee and Muscogee (Creek) Nations," she said. "I have had the opportunity to speak with several leaders from both nations about issues specific to their tribes. My tribal citizenship and heritage is very important to me, and, if elected, I hope to foster these relationships further to benefit the citizens of both nations."

A teacher with Owasso Public Schools, Keller is running against Catoosa Republican Terry O'Donnell. Several members of the legislature's Native American caucus are running unopposed this year, including Cherokee Nation citizen Rep. Chuck Hoskin (D-Vinita), Chickasaw Nation citizen and speakerelect Rep. T.W. Shannon (R-Lawton), and Muscogee (Creek) Nation citizens Rep. Dan Kirby (R-Tulsa) and Rep. Jerry McPeak (D-Warner).

Caucus co-founder Wesselhoft also did not draw an opponent, which he is taking as a positive sign.

"This shows that the people in my district have confidence in my abilities," he said. "This frees up my time to help other candidates and work on other projects, like the 2013 budget."

Wesselhoft, who is also a member of his tribe's legislature, has drawn on his experience and firsthand knowledge of Indian Country's economic impact on Oklahoma repeatedly while representing southern Oklahoma County and northern Cleveland County.

"Most tribes realize that there are only so many gaming dollars out there," he said. "It's very wise for our tribes to diversify. Having the knowledge and experience I do, I try to share that with non-Native legislators and sometimes wind up going against the wind.

"There are some people, legislators included, who are resistant to tribes and don't understand what sovereignty means."

Prairie, Texas, in 2011. The tribe says its strategy is to expand regionally.

"This purchase, if successful, would complement our strategy to increase our footprint in the Midwest as it puts us into two more regional markets with close proximity to our operations in Texas and Oklahoma," CEO John Elliott wrote in an email.

Global Gaming plans to keep the DiamondJacks name, Elliott said.

Raymond Cook, president of Legends, says the casinos will operate "as usual" until the sale closes. "We will continue to provide our guests with the same great value and service they have always enjoyed at our properties," he said in a statement. "Upon completion of the sale process, DiamondJacks will be part of Global Gaming and its parent family."

Though tribes in Louisiana and Mississippi operate casinos outside the state regulatory structure, state officials have said Global Gaming would be regulated and taxed just like any other non-Indian casino owner. Elliott said Global Gaming won't seek state regulatory approvals until the sale is finalized.

DiamondJacks is typically last among Bossier City's five casinos in terms of revenue, according to Louisiana state figures. Mississippi doesn't release revenue figures for individual casinos, but DiamondJacks has the second-largest number of slot machines among Vicksburg's four casinos. A fifth Vicksburg casino, Grand Station, closed in March amid its own bankruptcy.

DiamondJacks employs 364 people at its casino and hotel in Vicksburg, according to Mississippi figures. It employs about 650 people in Bossier City, according to Louisiana figures. Elliott said no layoffs are planned.

Both properties were the first casino in their respective cities when opened by the Isle of Capri. Vicksburg opened in 1993 while Bossier City opened a year later. Isle of Capri sold the gambling halls to privately-held Legends in 2006. Legends first filed bankruptcy in 2008 to lower interest rates on $215 million it borrowed to finance the purchases.

Kiowa Election Board schedules special elecion for Dec. 22

■ The Kiowa Election Board has been locked out of its office at the tribal complex since a June 2011 recall election, prompting a move east to the Anadarko Public Library.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON

Native American Times

CARNEGIE, Okla. - The Kiowa Election Board will be conducting a special election Dec. 22.

All eight seats on the tribe's business council and four seats on the Kiowa Housing Commission will be on the ballot. The filing fee is $150 per candidate. Potential candidates may file for office on Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays through Nov. 9 at the Anadarko Public Library, located at 215 W. Broadway, between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m.

All tribal citizens who are 21 years old or older are eligible to run for office except those who have been in debt to the tribe for at least two years or are convicted felons.

The Kiowa Election Board has been locked out of its office at the tribal complex since a June 2011 recall election, prompting the move east.

"Every time there is a recall election, they blame the election board," Kiowa Election Board chairman Dwayne Davis said. "We just run it. We don't get in the middle of it. When we get an order from the hearing board, we don't get a choice. We just follow those orders."

The election board is in the process of confirming a polling place in Carnegie.

Precincts in Lawton, Okla., and Hobart, Okla., have been secured.

The election board is also registering new voters through Nov. 23. Any Kiowa tribal citizen older than 18 is eligible to vote.

In addition to the 12 positions, issues brought before the Kiowa Indian Council at its 2011 and 2012 meetings will be on the ballot. Among those questions is a proposal that would allow the Kiowa Casino Operations Authority to refinance the tribe's Red River Casino in Devol, Okla., which is currently $46 million in debt.

After the Kiowa Indian Council meeting on Oct. 6, a representative for the tribe would not confirm a timeline for the election due to a vacancy on the election board. Davis said the board still has an open seat, but with four members, has enough for quorum to conduct business.

"We are required to have a quorum of three," he said. "We can still operate with the vacancy."

Under the tribe's constitution, issues presented at the Kiowa Indian Council meeting are supposed to be voted on during the first Saturday in November. Because the election board is combining the issues with the eight seats up for grabs, Davis said they have to allow 60 days from the election's announcement to allow sufficient time for voter registration and candidate filing.

The Kiowa Tribe's public relations office did not respond to requests for comment.

COMMENTARY

Addiction is a brain disease

RONALD SHAW, M.D. Osage

Alcoholism, chemical dependency or drug addiction are all terms for the same illness. It has many different manifestations. What many see as voluntary actions by the affected individual are actually the result of a compulsion to use or drink that is embedded in a psycho-social context. The behavior that is actually seen is the son that continues to drink despite mounting legal and financial consequences or the wife that shops doctors for her pain pills despite being seen to be sleepy and unsteady on her feet in the middle of the day with unremitting claims of pain. On the inside, these decisions to use or drink represent involuntary acts to continue to supply the drug to the brain and a persistent search for ever fleeting periods of euphoria or to simply prevent painful withdrawal. The actual drinking or using appears to be a voluntary act but it actually is an involuntary act that represents an overwhelming compulsion to use or drink as the result of dramatic changes in the reward center of the brain known as the meso-limbic system.

The amount of time required to develop these changes may be weeks to years depending on the drug and whether, yet to be precisely identified, pre-existing genetic abnormalities exist. Family history is an important risk factor. If an individual has one parent with a history of alcoholism that person's risk of developing alcoholism or drug addiction is more than doubled. If both parents were affected the risk is more than tripled. Nonetheless, many addict/alcoholic individuals have no immediate family with alcoholism/addiction. One feature of the disease of addiction is that of denial. Denial is a term that indicates the affected person's refusal to admit he/she has an abnormal relationship with a drug/ alcohol despite overwhelming evidence that ongoing use is causing multiple problems (1 egal,financial,medical,relat ionships). The presence or severity of the illness is not self-evident to the affected individual. Despite our best efforts to convince that son or mother that that he or she is dependent or addicted, they cannot see the damage that is being done and explain these major problems away with excuses that do not hold

Many people have never in their life experienced what appears to be a self-induced problem they could not handle on their own. They cannot accept that they got themselves in to this medical problem that they are unable to get themselves out of without help. One of the first steps to recovery of the affected individual is that of admitting that one does not have the power to control or stop their use of the drug/alcohol. Such surrender is perceived by the alcoholic/ addict as shameful or a sign of personal weakness leading some to delay reaching out for treatment for years while jobs are lost, marriages dissipated and perhaps even incarceration.

The good news is that there is effective treatment for this illness that can return the affected individual to healthy function. Medications are available to improve the patient's chances of recovery.

This month, be aware that alcohol/drug addiction is an illness and not a moral weakness or a bad habit. It is a real illness that requires real treatment.

MEANS

jewelry," Means said, recalling the early days of the movement. And there were dozens, if not hundreds, of athletic teams "that in essence were insulting us, from grade schools to college. That's all changed."

AIM was founded in the late 1960s to demand that the government honor its treaties with American Indian tribes. The movement eventually faded away, Means said, as Native Americans became more self-aware and selfdetermined.

There were plenty of American Indian activists before AIM, but it became the "radical media gorilla," said Paul DeMain, editor of News from Indian Country, a national newspaper focused on tribal affairs.

"If someone needed help, you called on the American Indian Movement, and they showed up and caused all kind of ruckus and looked beautiful on a 20-second clip on TV that night," DeMain said.

Means and AIM co-founder Dennis Banks were charged in 1974 for their role in the Wounded Knee uprising in which hundreds of protesters occupied the town on the site of the 1890 Indian massacre. Protesters and federal authorities were locked in a standoff for 71 days and frequently exchanged gunfire. Before it was over, two tribal members were killed and a federal agent seriously wounded.

After a trial that lasted several months, a judge threw out the charges on grounds of government misconduct.

Other protests led by Means included an American Indian prayer vigil on top of Mount Rushmore and the seizure of a replica of the Mayflower on Thanksgiving Day in Plymouth, Mass.

"The friendship between Russell and I goes back almost 50 years," Banks said late Monday night. "I lost a great friend. But Native people lost one of the greatest warriors of modern-day times. Truly, he was a great visionary. He was controversial, yes. But he brought issues to the front page."

But Means' constant quest for the spotlight raised doubts about his motives. Critics who included many fellow tribe members said his main interest was building his own notoriety.

Means said his most important accomplishment was the proposal for the Republic of Lakotah, a plan to carve out a sovereign Indian nation inside the United States. He took the idea all the way to the United Nations, even though it was ignored by tribal governments closer to home, including his own Oglala Sioux leaders, with whom he often clashed.

For decades, Means was dogged by questions about whether the group promoted violence, especially the 1975 slaying of a woman in the tribe and the gun battles with federal agents at Wounded Knee.

Authorities believe three AIM members shot and killed Annie Mae Aquash on the Pine Ridge reservation on the orders of someone in AIM's leadership because they suspected she was an FBI informant.

Two activists - Arlo Looking Cloud and John Graham – were both eventually convicted of murder. The third has never been charged.

Also in 1975, murder charges were filed against Means and Dick Marshall, an AIM member, in the shooting death of a Sioux man at a saloon in the town of Scenic, S.D. Marshall served 24 years in prison. Means was acquitted.

His activism extended to tribes beyond the United States. In the mid-1980s, Means traveled to Nicaragua to support indigenous Miskito Indians who were fighting the Sandinista government.

Born on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, Means grew up in the San Francisco area and battled drugs and alcohol as a young man before becoming an early leader of AIM.

With his rugged good looks and long, dark braids, he also was known for a handful of Hollywood roles, most notably in the 1992 movie "The Last of the Mohicans," in which he portrayed Chingachgook alongside Daniel Day-Lewis' Hawkeye.

He also appeared in the 1994 film "Natural Born Killers," voiced Chief Powhatan in the 1995 animated film "Pocahontas" and guest starred in 2004 on the HBO series "Curb Your Enthusiasm.

Means also ran unsuccessfully for the Libertarian nomination for president in 1988 and briefly served as a vice presidential candidate in 1984 on the ticket of Hustler publisher Larry Flynt.

Means always considered himself a Libertarian and couldn't believe that anyone would want to call themselves a Republican or a Democrat.

"It's just unconscionable that America has become so stupid," he said.

Means often refused interviews and verbally blasted journalists who showed up to cover his public appearances. Instead, he chose to speak to his fan base through YouTube videos and blog posts on his website.

Means recounted his life in the book "Where White Men Fear to Tread." He said he pulled no punches in the autobiography, admitting to his frailties but also acknowledging his successes.

"I tell the truth, and I expose myself as a weak, misguided, misdirected, dysfunctional human being I used to be," he said.

Means died at his ranch in Porcupine, S.D. He announced in August 2011 that he had inoperable throat cancer and told The Associated Press that he would forego mainstream medicine in favor of traditional American Indian remedies.

Means' death came a day after former Sen. George McGovern died in Sioux Falls at the age of 90. McGovern had traveled to Wounded Knee with then-Sen. James Abourezk during the takeover to try to negotiate an end to

"I've lost two good friends in a matter of two to three days," Abourezk said last Monday. "I don't pretend to understand it."

Wake services for Means' were Wedneday, Oct. 24 on Pine Ridge and his ashes were scattered in the Black Hills on Thursday.

Native American fashion magazine launches online

KRISTI EATON Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, South Dakota (AP) - Growing up on the Cheyenne River Indian Reservation, Kelly Holmes spent hours thumbing through the latest issues of Seventeen or Vogue. She noticed the models didn't look anything like her and the stories had little to do with her experiences in the vast, sparsely populated area hundreds of miles (kilometers) from any highend retailer.

So Holmes, a member of the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe, set out to create her own fashion magazine geared toward Native American men and women and non-Native Americans who want to learn about the culture.

Native Max focuses on indigenous people, places and cultures with the same sleek photography found in fashion magazines but without the headdresses stereotypical and tomahawks sometimes seen in the mainstream media. The premiere issue, which is online only, features interviews with Native American artists, musicians, designers and models, as well as sections on health, beauty and sports.

"There's really no magazine, a Native-owned and operated, Native-designed magazine. There's nothing like this magazine out there. The ones that do have stuff focused on younger people, they're really vulgar and very revealing," said Holmes, 21, who now lives in Denver.

The first issue of the quarterly magazine features Mariah Watchman as the cover model. Watchman, a member of the Confederated Tribes of the Umatilla Indian Reservation out of Oregon, catapulted to fame in Indian Country after becoming the first Native American woman Next Top Model."

While the magazine aims to present positive role models and uplifting messages, it will touch on controversial topics, Holmes said. In the premiere issue, Holmes interviewed two women who started a campaign called Save Wiyabe Project to highlight violence against Native American women. The U.S. Department of Justice estimates one out of every three Native women will be raped and one out of every four will be physically assaulted.

Rhonda LeValdo, president of the Native American Journalists Association, said Native Max and other Native-focused media show American society that Native Americans are regular people, too.

"They want to be models, movie stars, artists. I think that's showing the regular side as opposed to that stereotype of just showing us in our dance regalia," she said.

The magazine's nine staff members come from all over North America, including the Navajo Nation in Arizona and the Otomi and Yaqui nations in Mexico. Ad director and writer Angelica Gallegos, 20, of Denver, said she has enjoyed learning about new and up and coming Native American artists and musicians.

"I like how we want to involve a lot of people in the community and get ideas from them," said Gallegos, a member of the Santa Ana Pueblo and Jicarilla Apache tribes. "I also like the aspect of getting to know different artists and Native people around the country and how they're contributing to their people in different ways."

But LeValdo, a professor at Haskell Indian Nations University in Lawrence, Kan., said it's imperative for any new publication to have financial backing to survive. A few years ago, one of her students started a Native American music magazine but was only able to put out two issues before it folded.

Holmes has been searching for grants and investors but so far has had no luck. She said she invested about $1,000 of her own money to get the magazine going but hopes that advertising and sales will keep it afloat and maybe even provide a profit by mid-next year. Beginning in December, the magazine will switch to a print-only format, with issues mailed to subscribers at a cost of $10 each.

Native Max has fewer than 100 subscribers at the moment, but Holmes said she hopes to boost that with fashion events at various locations across the country. She said the obstacles in getting the magazine launched haven't tarnished her dream of having her own magazine for Native Americans.

"There are Natives out there who are talented," she said. "... I want it to be inspirational and to show to others, 'Hey, there is someone out there doing the same thing as me."

Girls and staff from BLING (BeLieving In Native Girls) rallied together to decorate the winning float in the non-profit category at the 81st Annual American Indian Exposition. BLING focuses on teaching healthy living skills to girls ages 12 and up who are attending Riverside Indian School.

After school group shows a little 'BLING' Program works to educate Native girls

■ BLING is open to all girls enrolled at Riverside who are between the ages of 12 and 18. Since its implementation in 2008, about 300 girls have gone through the program.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

ANADARKO, Okla. – An after-school group at a Bureau of Indian Education school has Native girls showing some bling.

Funded by a multi-year grant through the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' Office of Women's Health, Believing in Native Girls, or BLING, is a program at Riverside Indian School that works to educate Native girls about reproductive health, juvenile delinquency prevention, peer mentoring, bullying and how to make positive life decisions through discussion and role playing.

"A lot of these kids haven't had anyone to teach them about their bodies or what is and is not OK in relationships," program manager and Riverside graduate Carmen Klinekole said. "When they're at home and see Mom and Dad drinking and fighting all the time, they think that's normal. We talk with them about positive relationships and are happy to be there as a support for them."

One of two Indian boarding schools left in Oklahoma, Riverside Indian School serves more than 500 students from more than 60 tribes in grades four through 12. BLING is open to all girls enrolled at Riverside who are between the ages of 12 and 18. Since its implementation in 2008, about 300 girls have gone through the program.

"We focus on helping lay the foundation for these girls to make healthy choices," program director Deborah Scott said. "They're teenagers – it's hard enough as it is to make good choices."

Girls who complete a year in the program have an opportunity to join SuperBLING, which covers many of the same programs, but at a more intense level and with more leadership development opportunities.

Earlier this year, the girls won the float contest at the Comanche Nation Fair parade in Lawton, Okla. They also won the non-profit division of the American Indian Expo parade in August.

The participants also get the opportunity to attend conferences with Klinekole and other BLING staff members. The staff chooses up to two girls to represent the program at events hosted by the National Congress of American Indians, the National Indian Child Welfare Association and a handful of other national Native organizations.

"One year, we let two girls present with us at a conference," Klinekole said. "We watched them get up in front of this large national audience and listen to them talk in their native language about BLING and how much it has meant to them.

"It was simply amazing to see how much they had grown in their year in the group." The program's success has caught the campus' attention.

"Almost immediately after we started it, the boys started asking for something similar," Scott said. "We've been looking, but so far we just haven't been able to find grant funding for it."

As part of the grant terms, BLING hosts four campus-wide events each year, which has helped foster interest in the program among students and the Anadarko community as a whole.

One of those events, Riverside Indian School Empowered, brought more than 20 presenters to the dormitories Saturday, including representatives from the Kiowa Tribe's teen suicide prevention program out of Carnegie, Okla., and Indian Health Services.

"These presenters are coming in from all over," Klinekole said. "We have people coming in Albuquerque and Houston, plus local people. All of these different people are interested in helping us. The Wichita and Affiliated Tribes are sponsoring us. The Kiowa Teen Suicide Prevention program made a donation. Another local group donated supplies."

Scott said other organizations and area school districts, including Anadarko Public Schools' Office of Indian Education, have asked about implementing BLING or something similar.

"We'd love to roll it out to the public, but money's the big hiccup," she said. "There's been a lot of support and engagement on both sides. We just haven't found the right opportunity."

OSU play to focus on Okla. Native narratives

STILLWATER, Okla. — A new production highlighting Indian Country will debut at Oklahoma State University early next year.

Funded by a private grant, the school's theater department is creating "Oklahoma Voices," which will emphasize underrepresented groups in Oklahoma.

"A lot of the focus is on women, Freedmen and Native Americans," assistant theater professor Jodi Jinks said. "This piece will help give a voice to Oklahoma residents who really haven't had much of one."

With her students helping with the research, Jinks said the production will rely heavily on first-person narratives and oral history. Along with a graduate student, she has conducted many interviews with elders across the state, including attending a codetalkers meeting earlier this year.

"This is a production that will have very rich stories," Jinks said. "It offers perspectives from people in this section of the country that are rarely seen on stage."

The play will also include segments on significant moments in Oklahoma history, such as the 1921 Tulsa Race Riot and the Oklahoma City bombing.

Auditions are scheduled for Nov. 26 at the Vivia Locke stage of the Seretean Center for the Performing Arts at OSU-Stillwater. Rehearsals will start in January 2013 and the show will run Feb. 13-17, 2013.

TULSA, Okla. – Kiowa author N. Scott Momaday will be one of three Oklahomans honored with a new award honoring the state's leading artists.

The Oklahoma Center for Poets and Writers based at the Oklahoma State University-Tulsa campus will present the award to Momaday, author S.E. Hinton (The Outsiders) and to musician Roy Clark during a new event called Oklahoma Legends, 7 p.m. Nov. 1 at OSU-Tulsa, 700 N. Greenwood Ave.

NORMAN, Okla. – The exhibition of privately-collected American Indian art work continues at the Fred Jones Jr. Museum of Art and other locations on the University of Oklahoma campus in Norman. To provide curious visitors with more information on the exhibit, two gallery lectures will be held in November.

The James T. Bialac Native American Art Collection: Selected Works and Indigenous Aesthetics: Selections from the James T. Bialac Native American Art Collection remain open through Dec. 30 and feature just some of the collection of paintings, works on paper, kachinas and jewelry gifted by Arizona attorney James T. Bialac to the university this year. In total, Bialac gave more than 4,000 pieces, adding to the OU's existing Native arts collection, states a press release from the museum.

The works include art from tribes across the country, but most particularly from the Pueblo, Navajo, Hopi and tribes of the plains and southeast.

"It is an honor to share the James T. Bialac Native American Art Collection with our museum patrons because not only is it an example of the collector's passion and generosity, but the work represents many of the best artists from and cultural diversity of Native America," said Heather Ahtone, James T. Bialac Assistant Curator of Native American and Non-Western Art at the museum.

Bialac has served as a juror for many important native art shows and exhibits, including the prestigious Southwestern Association for Indian Arts (SWAIA) Santa Fe Indian Market. He began the fine art collection in 1964 and became friends with many of the artists he collected. Bialac began collecting kachina dolls in the 1950s.

At 12:30 p.m. Tuesday, Nov. 6, the museum offers the "Gallery Talk: Living Cultures" with Ahtone discussing Native American cultural dynamics found in works throughout the exhibits. It takes place in the Ellen and Richard L. Sandor Photography Gallery at the museum. On Nov. 15, Phoenix, Arizona, art appraiser Christy A. Vezolles will talk about how Bialac amassed his collection and about his friendships with artists, dealers and other collectors in American Indian art. "James T. Bialac: A Lasting Legacy" starts at 4 p.m. and will be held in the Mary Eddy and Fred Jones Auditorium at the museum, 555 Elm Ave., Norman.

Both events are free and open to the public. For more, call (405) 325-3272.

More tribes meet with state for preliminary compact discussions

■ At Tuesday's meeting, members of the media were allowed to stay for the first 85 minutes before being asked to leave at the request of two unnamed tribes.

MUSKOGEE, Okla. Representatives from the State of Oklahoma and several area tribes met Tuesday to begin preliminary compact discussions.

"This is just to open dialogue," Native American liaison Jacque Secondine Hensley said about the Muskogee meeting. "No one will walk away with a compact in hand."

Representatives from the Absentee Shawnee Tribe, Cherokee Nation, Citizen Potawatomi Band, Pawnee Nation, Ponca Tribe, Sac and Fox Tribe, Seminole Nation, United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians and the Wyandotte Tribe were among those attending the last of six meetings held across Oklahoma by state officials in advance of tobacco compact negotiations.

Tobacco compacts for 28 of Oklahoma's tribes expire in June 2013. Nine tribes do not have tobacco compacts with the state and the Muscogee (Creek) Nation signed one earlier this year that is in effect through Aug. 30, 2107.

Steven Mullins, general counsel for Gov. Mary Fallin, announced that he, along with Secretary of State Glenn Coffee, will be the lead negotiators for the state when formal negotiations begin in 2013 and outlined the changes that will be in the state's initial offers to tribes.

"All nations aren't the same," he said. "We will treat each one individually. I am not going to make everyone accept a compact negotiated by 10 powerful tribes."

Among the changes proposed by the state are the elimination of most favored nation clauses and border tax rates. Under the current compacts, lower tax rates are available for tribal smoke shops within 20 miles of Oklahoma's borders with Arkansas, Kansas or Missouri, which have lower tobacco tax rates than nontribal Oklahoma smoke shops.

"We do not want to use border rates," Mullins said. "They create an unfair advantage for some tribes and createanimosity. Having said that, that

1st Native saint stirs pride, skepticism

MARY ESCH Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) - Some traditional Mohawks are treating the naming of the nation's first Native American saint with skepticism and fear that the Roman Catholic Church is using it to shore up its image and marginalize traditional spiritual practices.

They see the story of Kateri Tekakwitha as yet another reminder of colonial atrocities and religious

"I was a recipient of these historical profanities and want to ensure this does not happen again," said Doug George-Kanentiio, a Mohawk writer who left Catholicism to follow traditional longhouse spiritual practices.

The daughter of a Mohawk chief and a Catholic Algonquin woman, Kateri was born in 1656 about 40 miles northwest of Albany and in the heart of the Iroquois Confederacy to which the Mohawks belong. She was orphaned at age 4 when smallpox wiped out her family and much of her village and left her blinded and disfigured.

A Catholic convert at 20, she settled in Kahnawake, a Mohawk settlement south of Montreal where Jesuits had a mission and where she and other women performed mortification rituals such as selfflogging as part of their faith. At her death at the age of 24, Kateri's smallpox scars reportedly vanished and later she was reported to appear before several people. She is buried at a shrine on Kahnawake.

Speaking in English and French at her canonization last Sunday, Pope Benedict XVI noted how unusual it was in Kateri's culture for her to choose to devote herself to her Catholic faith.

Under treaties and a 1908 Supreme Court ruling, the Kickapoo and other tribes have the right to waters that flow through their reservations.

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) -A water board's decadeslong refusal to exercise its power of eminent domain to facilitate the building of a reservoir on the Kickapoo tribal reservation in northeast Kansas shows discrimination, the chairman of the Native American tribe said last week.

The Kickapoo Tribe of Kansas has been planning since the late 1970s to build the 1,200-acre Plum Creek Reservoir to ease water shortages on its reservation about 90 miles northwest of Kansas City. The plan involves damming an area along Plum Creek, which flows into the Delaware River.

In 1998, Congress approved an agreement between the Kickapoo and the Nemaha-Brown Watershed Board to build the dam as part of another watershed program. But some landowners refused to sell their property and the watershed board has since declined to use its power of eminent domain to take the land, according to the Topeka Capital-Journal.

Under treaties and a 1908 Supreme Court ruling, the Kickapooandothertribeshave the right to waters that flow through their reservations, Kickapoo Chairman Steve Cadue said. The reservoir is similar in scope to hundreds of others built in Kansas that relied on eminent domain and yet the board won't help, Cadue told The Associated Press Oct. 30.

"They are reluctant to condemn white man's land for the benefit of Kickapoo not immediately returned.

During a visit to Topeka on Friday, Cadue delivered a letter for Gov. Sam Brownback asking for his assistance in resolving the dispute.

"We despise the need to file federal lawsuits in order to secure our sovereign treaty water rights and we would believe you feel the same," Cadue said in the letter.

Brownback spokeswoman Sherriene Jones-Sontag said in an email to reporters that both parties rejected the option of the governor's administration mediating in the dispute in formal filings with the federal district court in June. The governor's office "does not have the authority to bind either the Kickapoo Tribe or the Nemaha Brown Watershed Board in this litigation," Jones-Sontag said, adding that Cadue has in the past agreed with this point.

Nonetheless, Cadue said he still expected to hear directly from Brownback, a former U.S. Senator from Kansas, to help ease the stalemate.

"When he was in the U.S. senator's office he said he was very supportive of the water project, he knew its value and its purpose, and he said it was a state issue," Cadue said. "And now guess what, he's the governor."

Muscogee (Creek) Nation acquires naming rights to Tulsa Fairground's Expo Center

■ Additionally, the tribe gets first right through 2015 to propose a new use for the old Drillers Stadium at the northeast corner of the fairgrounds.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

TULSA, Okla. - Tulsa's iconic Golden Driller statue gets a new neighbor in Starting in January, the Muscogee (Creek) Nation will have the naming rights for the Expo Square at the Tulsa Fairgrounds through 2019. In exchange for $1.44 million annually - or $200,000 per month - the building currently known as the QuikTrip Center will become the Muscogee (Creek) Nation Center.

"We see this as a win-win," Muscogee (Creek) Nation Principal Chief George Tiger said Nov. 2 at a press conference at the tribe's headquarters in Okmulgee, Okla. "We see this as an opportunity to promote not only events at the fairgrounds, but ourselves as well. This is a tool not only for the tribe, but for the Expo Square as well.

"We're just blessed we can do it. This site is within our original jurisdiction and this can be used as a blueprint for other tribes to do similar partnerships."

Approved unanimously Nov. 1 by the Tulsa County fair board, the agreement also includes a provision that Fair Meadows, a horse racing track on the fairgrounds' property, will stop conducting live races. Prior to the Muscogee (Creek) Nation's new agreement, the track was partially subsidized through a compact with the Cherokee, Muscogee (Creek) and Osage nations, which all have at least one casino within 20 miles of the fairgrounds.

Signed in 2005, the 15-year compact required the three tribes to contribute at least a combined $2 million to the track's purse fund in exchange for Fair Meadows' management not installing gaming machines. The agreement was also contingent upon the track hosting at least 400 live races annually during its 34-day season.

Principal Chief George Tiger would not comment on how much the tribe paid annually to the fund other than the Muscogee (Creek) Nation paid more into it than the other two and that the overall savings to the tribe would make up for the seven-figure yearly price tag.

"We see it as a savings," he said. "Whatever money we were paying out to them before will be coming back into our coffers."

Over the last seven years, Fair Meadows has lost at least $695,000 each year thanks in part to dwindling attendance. Under the agreement, the fairgrounds board has the option to repurpose the racetrack if it chooses.

"Horse racing's no longer a spectator sport," Fair Meadows race director Ron Shotts. "It's a participant sport. We're averaging maybe 400 people per day at the track. The facts were what they

The agreement runs through 2019

but will remain in effect beyond that as long as Oklahoma's tribes have a gaming compact with the Remington Park and Will Rogers Downs racetracks in Oklahoma City and Claremore, respectively.

Additionally, the tribe gets first right through 2015 to propose a new use for the old Drillers Stadium at the northeast corner of the fairgrounds. The former home of Tulsa's minor league baseball team, the stadium has not been used since the end of the 2009 season and any repurposing efforts would be subject to approval by the Tulsa County Fair Board. Creek Nation officials did not announce any new plans for the property at a press conference Friday but did rule out one

"I want to say with emphasis that the Muscogee (Creek) Nation will not be building a casino on that site," Tiger

Although the tribe will not be putting in a casino at 15th and Yale, revenue from its gaming facilities made the acquisition possible. The tribe's two other multimillion dollar real estate purchases this year - the Riverwalk Crossing shopping center in Jenks, Okla., and the Okmulgee Country Club - were paid for through the capitol improvements portion of the tribe's budget.

"Gaming dollars paid for this (the naming rights)," Tiger said. "Money that was already going to Fair Meadows is paying for this."

Obama proclaims Nov. 23 Native American Heritage Day

WHITE HOUSE PRESS SECRETARY News Release

WASHINGTON - President Barack Obama released a proclamation Nov. 1 declaring Nov. 23 Native American Heritage Day.

An except of proclamation reads:

"As the first people to live on the land we all cherish, American Indians and Alaska Natives have profoundly shaped our country's character and our cultural heritage.

Today, Native Americans are leaders in every aspect of our society -- from the classroom, to the boardroom, to the battlefield. This month, we celebrate and honor the many ways American Indians and Alaska Natives have enriched our Nation, and we renew our commitment to respecting each tribe's identity while ensuring equal opportunity to pursue the American dream.

In paying tribute to Native American achievements, we must also acknowledge the parts of our shared history that have been marred by violence and tragic mistreatment. For centuries, Native Americans faced cruelty, injustice, and broken promises. As we work together to forge a brighter future, we cannot shy away from the difficult aspects of our past. That is why, in 2009, I signed a bipartisan resolution that finally recognized the sad and painful chapters in our shared history.

My Administration remains dedicated to writing a new chapter in that history by strengthening our government-to-government relationship with tribal nations while enhancing tribal sovereignty and tribal self-determination.

Because we know that the best ideas for tribal nations come from within, my Administration has continued to engage tribal leaders in developing an agenda that respects their expertise on matters affecting American Indians and Alaska Natives. In collaboration with tribal nations, we are making critical investments to improve health and education services, create jobs, and strengthen tribal economies.

In July, I was proud to sign the Helping Expedite and Advance Responsible Tribal Homeownership (HEARTH) Act into law, which will enhance tribal control over the leasing of Indian lands. Last December, I signed an Executive Order to expand educational opportunities for Native American students. It aims to preserve Native languages, cultures, and histories while offering a competitive education that prepares young people to succeed in college and careers. And under the Tribal Law and Order Act and the Safe Indian Communities initiative, we are continuing to work with tribes to build safer communities. My Administration also supports the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.

As we celebrate National Native American Heritage Month, let us move forward in the spirit of mutual understanding and mutual trust, confident that our challenges can be met and that our shared future is bright."

their leadership met at a neutral site to discuss the situation. Two additional meetings were held during construction suspension: one in Sacramento, Calif., during the annual convention of the National Congress of American Indians and one in Tulsa, Okla., to allow the mekko, or leader, of the ceremonial grounds to attend.

"We have taken great effort to make sure the original Hickory Ground ceremonial site is preserved and the remains that were removed earlier have been reinterred at Hickory Ground Town in a manner previously agreed to by traditional leaders in Oklahoma," Poarch Band Tribal Council member and government affairs officer Robert McGhee said. "The remaining acreage located on the northern part of Hickory Ground will be preserved in a pristine, natural state for posterity."

refuted McGhee's comments and expressed his disappointment in the decision.

"From the beginning, it has been our stance that the remains should be put back where they were excavated," he said. "The ceremonial ground remains sacred, so it is not a proper place for a casino. Hickory Ground needs to be restored to nature -- that's what we are striving Principal Chief George Tiger echoed Thompson's concerns while acknowledging that the two tribes are now back to the proverbial drawing board.

"This has been a sensitive topic," he said. "As a nation, we have facilitated three meetings to try to see if we could come to some kind of conclusion. We knew this would be difficult going in. The biggest thing we see is that traditions as we know it here in Oklahoma are not the same as it is Alabama. We value our culture and how things have been handed down to us. Alabama is still in an educational process.

"It's unfortunate that this is going to continue. The Alabama tribe maintains that the project They had to make a decision and we're going to have to make one, too."

If completed, the casino is scheduled to open in January 2014 with 2,500 gaming machines and will include a 20-story hotel with 285 rooms. It is expected to create an additional 1,000 jobs In a statement issued late Wednesday night for the Wetumpka, Ala., area. The 3,000-citizen Poarch Band of Creek Indians also operates the mekko of Hickory Grounds for 42 years, casinos in Montgomery, Ala., and Atmore, Ala.

Judge denies satellite voting for Montana Indians

MATTHEW BROWN
Associated Press

BILLINGS, Mont. (AP) – A federal judge last week denied an emergency order sought by a group of American Indians who wanted to force officials to provide satellite voting on Montana reservations, effectively putting off resolution of the issue until after Election Day.

Fifteen Indians from the remote Crow, Northern Cheyenne and Fort Belknap reservations argued in a lawsuit filed earlier this month that the long distances they must drive for early voting and late registration leaves them disadvantaged compared to white voters.

But U.S. District Judge Richard Cebull said regardless of whether voting discrimination exists, the plaintiffs did not show they were unable to vote for the candidates of their choice.

"I'm not arguing that the opportunity is equal for Indian persons as it is to non-Indians," Cebull said. "Because of poverty, because of the lack of vehicles and that sort of thing, it's probably not equal. However, you have to prove ... that they can't elect candidates of their choice."

Plaintiffs' attorney Steven Sandven said there was too little time before the election to appeal Cebull's ruling on the injunction request. But the lawsuit alleging discrimination by county and state officials will continue, he said.

"Now we're in it for the long haul," Sandven said.

The lawsuit targets officials from Rosebud, Blaine and Bighorn counties and the Montana Secretary of State's Office.

Plaintiff and Fort Belknap tribal council member Edward Moore, Jr. said he and his neighbors in the town of Hayes have to travel more than 120 miles roundtrip to vote early in person at the county courthouse in Chinook. That costs money for gas and requires time off from work – hurdles that are magnified in a community with high poverty levels and where many don't have vehicles.

"It's a big burden," Moore said, adding that many people

"may not vote at all" as a

Montanans can vote early absentee ballots by mail or by delivering ballots in person to county offices. Late registration begins at county offices a month before Election Day. Voting on Nov. 6 was not at issue in the case.

U.S. Department of Justice attorneys submitted court filings in support of the plaintiffs. Those included a deposition from a University of Wyoming geography professor who said American Indians from the reservations must drive at least twice as far than whites to vote before Election Day.

American Indians also suffer from much higher rates of poverty, further inhibiting their ability to reach county courthouses that are the only place in the three counties to vote early or register late.

"The practical reality is that Indian voters in Big Horn, Blaine and Rosebud counties do not have the same opportunity as white voters," Department of Justice attorneys wrote in their filings.

But during a two-day hearing before Cebull, there was no testimony from any American Indian who had been prevented from voting. Sara Frankenstein, the attorney for the counties, used testimony from Rosebud County Clerk and Recorder Geraldine Custer and other officials to show that Indians have used the current voting process to elect other Indians.

County officials said there was neither enough time nor workers to set up and staff satellite offices before Nov. 6.

Other county officials pointed to voter advocacy work done on reservations by the group Western Native Voice as an example of efforts under way to increase American Indian voting.

An organizer from the group, Jessie James Hawley, said the lawsuit threatens to sour relations between tribes and their county officials over an issue that she's already working to address.

State and county officials have said that given more time, they might have been able to set up the satellite offices. Two Rosebud County commissioners, Douglas Martens and Robert E. Lee, voted last month to deny the request. However, they said they would continue discussions on the issue.

The county's third commissioner, Danny Sioux, a member of the Northern Cheyenne, was in favor of setting up a satellite voting office in Lame Deer but was outnumbered when it came up for a vote.

Tom Rodgers is an enrolled Blackfeet member who previously tried to get the Secretary of State's office to help set up the office on the reservation. He said the state's refusal – coupled with the resistance from county officials – shows the history of racial discrimination against American Indians is repeating itself in Montana.

"It's a more subtle, soft discrimination," he said. If we did not push for this, it would not have happened," said Rodgers, a lobbyist from the Washington, D.C. area who said he does pro-bono work for tribes.

doesn't necessarily mean 'no more border rates.' We just won't start with them when we start negotiations."

The state also wants to eliminate some tax rate recipients. Under the current compacts, the $10.30 tax on each carton is divided among three or four recipients: the state, the tribe, the retailer and, depending on the compact, the customer via reduced rates. In its first offer, the state will eliminate retailers and the reduced rate option, creating a two-tier system in which the tax revenue from each carton will only divided between the tribe and the state.

"We want to agree on a tax rate and what portion we each get," Mullins said. "We will make a base offer on the percentages, but I don't know yet what that will be."

The proposed changes prompted one tribal leader, Chairman Rocky Barrett of the Citizen Potawatomi Nation, to ask whether a third party would be getting involved in the negotiations.

"Is a big chain of convenience stores in Tulsa going to dictate the rates?" he asked, referring to QuikTrip Corporation, whose leadership has criticized the different tax rates used by tribal smoke shops compared to non-tribally owned retailers.

Mullins said the Tulsa-based chain was not allowed in to the Muscogee (Creek) Nation's compact negotiations earlier this year and would not be part of the 2013 discussions.

"It's fair to say that we respect your sovereignty and ask you to respect the state's," Mullins said. "We have a better relationship now than we've had in the past. It is not ever going to be perfect, but we are making great strides."

Other compact areas were also touched on, including law enforcement and gaming, although the latter is not up for renewal statewide until 2020.

"We are not initiating those discussions,"

Mullins said. "Some tribes are and have approached us about it since they are using eight- and 10-year business plans and that's fine.

"We are willing to talk, but will not enter into negotiations now. We will respect the compacts that are in place and will enforce them."

Like the other five meetings across the state, Tuesday's meeting was held behind quasiclosed doors. The governor's office does not meet the definition of "public body" outlined in the Oklahoma Open Meetings Act. As sovereign nations, federally-recognized tribes do not fall under that law, prompting Gov. Fallin's general counsel to describe the meetings as not secret, but not open.

"This has to do with public business," said Joey Senat, a board member of Freedom of Information Oklahoma, Inc., and an associate professor at Oklahoma State University's School of Strategic and Mass Communications. "This is using the Open Meeting Act to say "Well, we don't have to have it open.' However, nothing prohibits them from having the meetings open to the public."

Members of the public, including the press, could only stay at the compact discussions if all tribal representatives present consented. At last week's meeting, members of the media were allowed to stay for the first 85 minutes before being asked to leave at the request of two unnamed tribes.

"It's a fine distinction: the public knows the meeting is going on, but can't be in there," Senat said. "That's not much consolation. It also allows for favoritism: what if one member of the press or the public is allowed to stay but another is excluded?

"Clearly there's an interest on both sides – both with tribes and the state – in these meetings. There's jobs and money involved; the public on both sides have an interest in that. Having those discussions with the public present helps everyone understand the final agreement, including what made it in and what didn't."

NAJA recognizes Native American Heritage Month, lauds Tim Giago

Giago is the first Native American ever to be inducted into the South Dakota Newspaper Hall of Fame.

RHONDA LeVALDO

Native American Journalists

Association

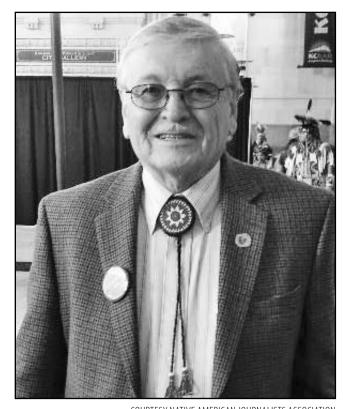

NORMAN, Okla. - The Native American Journalists Association recognizes November as Native American Heritage Month and we are encouraging journalists everywhere to cover a Native American issue. Broader coverage of Native nations by the media means exposure of important topics for Native American people.

In recognition of this month and of NAJA's own unique history, a biography of NAJA's first president, Tim Giago, is below:

Tim Giago was born on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota on July 12, 1934. He attended elementary and high school at the Holy Rosary Indian Mission. He enlisted in the United States Navy during the Korean Conflict in 1951 and was honorably discharged in 1958.

He attended college at San Jose Junior College in San Jose, Calif. in 1960 under the G.I. Bill and transferred to the University of Nevada at Reno. He majored in business with a minor in journalism. He was awarded the prestigious Nieman Fellowship in Journalism to Harvard University for the years 1990-1991

Giago was the founder of the Lakota Times in 1981. The newspaper withstood firebombs, had its windows shot out with shotguns on three separate occasions and Giago received many death threats including one attempt on his life while building the newspaper successfully on the Pine Ridge Reservation. The paper was re-named Indian Country Today in 1992. He served as editor and publisher for 18 years building it into the largest independent Indian newspaper in America before selling the paper in 1998. He started the Lakota Journal in 2000 and served as its editor and publisher until his retirement in July of 2004.

He was the first president of the Native American Journalists Association in 1984. In 1983 he sent letters to every Indian newspaper he could find asking them if they would be interested in forming a Native American Press Association. He then worked with Journalism Professor Bill Dulaney of Penn State to raise the money to hold the first meeting of Indian journalists at Penn State. He was elected as the first President of the association when it was formally assembled on the Choctaw Nation the next year. He was the recipient of the H.L. Mencken Award for Editorial Writing from the Baltimore Sun in 1985. He holds Honorary Doctoral Degrees from Bacone College in Oklahoma and from the Nebraska Indian Community College at Winnebago, Neb.

Giago was inducted into the South Dakota Hall of Fame in 1994. He became the first Native American ever to be inducted into the South Dakota Newspaper Hall of Fame on November 10, 2007.

Giago has received many professional awards including the University of Missouri School of Journalism's Honor Award for Distinguished Service in Journalism in 1991, The South Dakota Education Association/ National Education Human and Civil Rights Award in 1988, the Golden Quill Award for Outstanding Editorial Writing by the International Society of Weekly Newspaper Editors in 1997, and Best Local Column by the South Dakota Newspaper Association for the years 1985 and 2003 and the Great Spirits Award from the Navajo Institute of Social Justice in September of 2004. The Harvard Foundation honored him in 1991 for his contributions to the growth of American Indian newspapers and Indian journalism.

A column by Giago challenging Republican Governor George Mickelson of South Dakota to proclaim 1990 a Year of Reconciliation to commemorate the 100th Anniversary of the Massacre at Wounded Knee was accepted by the Governor and 1990 was proclaimed The Year of Reconciliation between Indians and whites.

That same year an editorial by Giago challenged Gov. Mickelson to replace Columbus Day with Native American Day. The legislators voted in favor of it and South Dakota became the only state in the union to celebrate Native American Day as a state holiday.

Giago received the NAJA Lifetime Achievement Award in 2011.

Prayer group attends ceremony for Kateri Tekakwitha

MICHELLE THERIAULT BOOTS
Anchorage Daily News

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) – For years, a group of women gathered in fluorescent-lit Anchorage church basements to sing hymns in Yup'ik, say the rosary and pray for the Catholic church to canonize its first Native American saint.

On Oct. 21, it happened.

Kateri Tekakwitha, a pious 17thcentury Mohawk and Algonquin woman who has long been an emblem for Native American Catholics nationwide, officially became a saint.

In Rome to witness the moment were 56 Alaskans, including some from the Kateri Circle at East Anchorage's St. Anthony Catholic Church.

Francine Bolewicz was one of them. She stood among dozens of other kuspuk-clad Alaskans in a crowd of 80,000 at the Vatican's St. Peter's Square for a ceremony honoring St. Kateri and six other new saints.

It was a moment Bolewicz been hoping for since her mother told her stories of Kateri as a young girl.

"I wanted to jump but there was too many people," said Bolewicz, originally from Upper Kalskag. "It made me feel so good that a Native American became a saint. My mom would be so happy."

Aimee Aloysius, who grew up in Bethel, said the sainthood of Kateri has a special significance to Alaska Natives, who have long felt a sense of ownership and pride in her story.

"She's our saint," Aloysius said over a Kateri Circle meeting lunch of salmon and pizza Thursday. "Someone from our own people."

More than 100 Native American parishes nationwide hold Kateri Circles, according to the Tekakwitha Conference.

Tekakwitha was born in upstate New York in the 1600s to a Mohawk father and Algonquin mother. She was known for her devotion to the church and ascetic lifestyle. Disfigured from a smallpox outbreak that orphaned her as a young child, she died at age 24.

a young child, she died at age 24.

Her path to sainthood took more than 300 years

In 2011, she passed the final step when the Roman Catholic Church attributed a miracle necessary for canonization to her.

The miracle had roots in the Pacific Northwest, making it all feel even closer for the St. Anthony's Kateri Circle women, said Gemma Gaudio, who also went on the pilgrimage.

According to the Catholic church, a young Bellingham, Wash., Lummi Nation boy named Jake Finkbonner was cured of a devastating flesheating bacterial infection in 2006 after his parents prayed to Kateri.

The now 12-year-old Finkbonner and his family attended the canonization and met some of the Alaskans.

"A lot of elderly people wanted to shake his hand and he hugged them instead," said Gaudio.

Alaskans on the pilgrimage included archbishops of both the Anchorage and Fairbanks archdioceses, an 85-year-old priest from Kaltag and dozens of faithful from around the state, including many Alaska Natives. A family from Aniak brought salmon strips, said Sister Frances Vista, who works with the Kateri Circle. Some also took a trip to Tekakwitha's birthplace in upstate New York.

The Alaska pilgrims saved and raised money for the trip to Rome for months, she said. Those who stayed home held a special Mass honoring the occasion.

Now that the trip is over, the group will continue meeting at the Kateri Circle on Thursday mornings. They say a prayer honoring St. Kateri rather than one asking for her canonization.

They hope the sainthood of Kateri might help their own children and grandchildren find themselves reflected in modern Catholicism.

Only 3.5 percent of American Catholics are Native American or Alaska Native, according to the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"I tell my grandchildren we have a saint that's on our side now," said Aloysius. "Pray to her."

education, elder services and economic development. A joint committee with members from the Pawnee Business Council and Nasharo Council, or Chiefs' Council, is supposed to decide how to divide that money. To date, the committee's membership has not been announced, nor has a timeline been given for when programs will be selected to receive funds.

"People should realize that things like this aren't done overnight," President Marshall Gover said. "We have to be frugal and careful with what we get."

In the press release announcing the per capita payment, the tribe also promised a financial statement would be published quarterly in its newsletter, Chaticks Si Chaticks. The report was not included in the newsletter's most recent edition, but Executive Director Dawna Hare said work is already underway on the next issue to include an update on the settlement.

The questions concerning the settlement funds came up during discussion of whether to amend the meeting's agenda to allow the press to stay.

"I have mixed feelings about excluding the press," Pawnee Business Council member Carol Nuttle said. "We have to look at the overall picture and do what's best for all of our people, though."

After voting unanimously to amend its agenda, all seven members of the council voted to exclude the media from the meeting and the administration building.

"This is an internal matter," Pawnee Business Council member Karla KnifeChief said. "Our meetings are open to Pawnee citizens. If they want to know what's going on, they can read our newsletter or come to the council meetings rather than call the press."

The next regular meeting of the Pawnee Business Council is scheduled for Nov. 14.

and Christianity, said the Rev. Jim Martin, a Jesuit priest. He said the Jesuit missionaries "took great pains to learn the native languages and tried their best to present the Christian faith using words, phrases and ideas from the native cultures."

Traditional Mohawks recognize the reverence their Catholic relatives and friends have for Kateri, said Chaz Kader, a Mohawk journalist who was raised Catholic but follows ancient longhouse traditions now. But many remain troubled by how the church portrays her life.

The story of Kateri told in various church writings describes her as maintaining her faith despite torment by her people, suffering ostracism and persecution at the hands of her own tribe and eventually fleeing to Canada.

"I disagreewith the characterizations of the 'other Mohawks' in the Jesuit accounts of Kateri," Kader said. "The contrast of good Mohawks and bad Mohawks still is affecting our people."

Traditional Mohawks have struggled to keep their spiritual traditions and ancient language alive despite pressure from non-Indians to adopt European religion, culture and language.

traditionalists These Mohawk established languageimmersion schools and follow a clanbased government separate from the elected tribal government recognized by the U.S., Canada and New York state. To outsiders, they are associated with an image of "bad Mohawks" who smuggle goods across the border and refuse to collect state taxes on cigarette sales, Kader said, and the "good Mohawks" are the ones who "went to Rome to celebrate Kateri," he added.

It's difficult to gauge just how widespread the feelings are given the factionalism that pervades the nation and the circumspection they favor when dealing with the media. But many Mohawks interviewed downplayed any controversy and joined Catholics who see Kateri as a uniting figure and hope her elevation to sainthood will help heal old wounds.

"It's so nice to see God showing all the flavors of the world," said Gene Caldwell, a Native American member of the Menominee reservation in Neopit, Wis., who attended Kateri's canonization with his wife, Linda. "The Native Americans are enthralled" to have Kateri attain sainthood, he said.

Russell Roundpoint, director of the Mohawk history and cultural center at Akwesasne, said her sainthood is "not a contentious issue by any stretch of the imagination.

"The Mohawk people are very proud of the fact that she has attained such a high level," he said.

Sister Jennifer Votraw is director of communications for the Ogdensburg Diocese in northern New York, where the Mohawk reservation is located. While the diocese doesn't provide direct pastoral care to the Mohawks, Votraw belongs to the order the Sisters of St. Joseph, nuns who regularly aid the priests who minister to the tribe. She said years of successful interactions between the church and the tribe demonstrate a mutual respect for each other.

Still, she knows there are traditional Mohawks who will never be swayed in their view of the church and may resent Kateri's canonization as a ploy to improve the church's image among Native Americans.

"They believe very firmly in their religion, which is Mohawk," she said. "You just have to respect that."

Orenda Boucher, a Mohawk humanities professor at Kiana Institution, a Native American college near Montreal, said there are "mixed feelings" and no easy answer to the question of what Kateri represents to Mohawks or the rest of the world.

"A lot of my friends who are traditionalists see Kateri as tied into the story of colonization that has deeply affected Kahnawake, and to the atrocities of the church," she said.

Boucher said to understand the complexities of Kateri's life, it's important for people to look beyond the biographies written by clergymen who focus on what they consider her Christian virtues.

George-Kanentiio said traditional Iroquois worry that Kateri's sainthood could be used as way to encourage Native Americans to eschew their ancestral values for Catholic dogma.

"It should never obscure the best elements of our aboriginal spirituality, nor should Kateri's personal behaviors, given their extremities, be endorsed as a model for women anywhere," he said, referring to her self-mutilation with whips, thorns and hot coals.

"Women in particular need not kneel in supplication to any man or any god but to rise to dance and sing in true joy," he said. "We can never accept any institution which actively suppresses women or qualifies their potential."

COMMENTARY

Heart disease and diabetes have invaded Indian Country

TIM GIAGO (Nanwica Kciji) © 2012 Unity South Dakota

One day I was scheduled to go into surgery at the Rapid City Eye Institute for a detached retina and while I was on the gurney hooked up to monitors the nurse attending me called a physician and he studied the heart monitor and suddenly stopped the tests and disconnected me from everything. I was told that my heartbeat was extremely slow and they were taking me over to the cardiac ward.

I was very lucky that my eye exam revealed a deeper problem. I was taken to the emergency examining room and hooked up to a lot of instruments, blood drawn about every hour or so and asked a lot of questions. One doctor was about to listen to my heartbeat when the crew that draws the blood arrived. The doctor said, "I'll be back after the vampires leave." It's funny how you remember mundane things like that when you are facing one of the biggest threats in your life.

I was finally taken to another area of the hospital where a doctor told me he was about to insert an instrument into the vein in my thigh, threading a tiny wire up the artery all the way to my heart to check for the points of blockage. This would allow the doctor to see all of the arteries in my heart. A local anesthetic had been given and there was absolutely no pain associated with the procedure thus far.

After the testing he told me that I had at least six vessels with blockage and that he would not recommend stents. Instead he recommended open heart surgery to replace the blocked arteries with vessels taken from my arm and leg. Now that did sound a little scary.

The next day I was lying in the preparation room while the anesthesiologist talked quietly and calmly to me while applying an anesthesia through the IV in my arm. My daughter Terri was at my bedside and as I was leaving the world of reality she told me I said to the doctor, "Will I be able to play the piano after this heart operation?" She told me the doctor said, "Yes, of course you will." I replied, just before sinking into total oblivion, "That's great Doctor because I can't play a piano now." I guess the humor released at this particular time relieved some of the stress, or else I was just plain zonked out.

The operation lasted about six hours. I was moved to the ICU ward for the night and I woke up the following day in the recovery ward. The ward I was on was called the Cabbage Pod, a name derived from all of the acronyms associated with cardiology.

The new procedure is to get the patient out of bed and on his feet as soon as possible. Two sturdy male nurses showed up by my bed the day after the surgery and very gently forced me to sit on the edge of the bed and then made me move my feet to the floor. Now that is when I felt a lot of pain. Remember, the surgeons had split my chest down the middle, put their hands inside of my chest cavity and replaced the blocked arteries in my heart with the new arteries from my arm and leg. I was told that my chest would take time to mend itself and that I should not try to lift myself up by pushing with my arms because the effort could cause damage at the operation site.

The male nurses stood on both sides of me and gave me support as I attempted to walk the short course they had chosen for me. That's when I realized that the operation to take the arteries from my legs and arm was also very painful. Now let me tell you, this is something I would not like to do again. After seven days I was allowed to go home. When I got home my family had found a little black kitten for me that they had named Cabbage Pod after the ward I was on. Pod is now seven years old and he has been my favorite pet since that time and it is amazing what a pet can do to help restore your health.

Open heart surgery is no picnic and heart disease is approaching epidemic proportions on many Indian reservations. All of the years of eating the commodity foods so high in fats and starches that are delivered to the reservations by the United States Department of Agriculture have taken a heavy toll, not only in heart disease, but also in diabetes which contributes greatly to the heart disease.

The Indian Health Service is pressed to its limits and it is facing heavy financial cuts even though Native Americans on reservations like the Pine Ridge in South Dakota have the shortest life expectancy in America. A Lakota friend of mine was facing open heart surgery and I wrote this column to let him know that I survived and so will he. He did just fine.

The Indian Health Service cannot care for the thousands of Indians it serves if its budget is cut again. We (Indians) are asking those people who care about us to let their Congressmen and women know that many lives are at stake if we lose what little funding we now receive.

My friend said that reading about my operation really helped.

Casket company brings jobs, hope, to reservation

Launching a start-up on a reservation is a struggle. There are no banks on the reservation, and because land is often tribalowned or in trust, outside banks are hesitant to loan to Native Americans with few assets.

RYAN LENGERICH

Rapid City Journal

RAPID CITY, S.D. (AP) - Roby Cottier always wanted to own a woodworking business, but kick-starting any venture on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation is like walking up the down escalator.

He had no assets or collateral, so a loan was a long shot. Two months ago, he had nothing to do but spend afternoons on his couch, eating potato chips. Then something happened. He landed a job - a woodworking job - on the reservation.

Now, though he may not be the owner of his own woodworking business, Cottier, 32, is a foreman at Sioux-Preme Wood Products Co., a wood-casket assembly company that opened last month in Manderson.

The company, owned by a group of investors led by the Wounded Knee Community Development Corp., is a landmark in economic development for a reservation where unemployment is almost 80 percent.

Cottier manages 11 employees who assemble and detail solid-wood caskets for Native and non-Native customers across the Black Hills and surrounding states.

"They all have families," Cottier said of his employees. "You know how that makes me feel? It makes me feel good to know I actually accomplish something. We are making history on the reservation as a business."

Up a dirt road just minutes outside Manderson, population 626, sit three white, former school buildings. The view across the plains is spectacular, but as recently as last winter, the structures sat in ruin with damaged siding and shattered windows. They are now a symbol for economic good on the reservation.

"It means a new future. It is a new way of doing things," said General Manager Mark St.

The journey has been arduous for St. Pierre. It took from March to September to redirect a $99,000 federal grant from a previously approved strip mall project toward the casket company. Had he not realigned the grant money, the deadline to spend it on the strip mall would have expired, St. Pierre said.

Sioux-Preme buys casket kits from a Native American-owned supplier in Colorado. The wood is sanded, assembled, finished in a spray room and lined with custom fabric at the Pine Ridge plant. The final products range from a $500 pine box with rope handles to a cedar model that sells for about $2,500.

St. Pierre aims to build and ship 80 caskets per month by September 2013. He hopes next year to buy precision cutting machines to build the caskets from wood to finished product, without the kits. The current business model eases the learning curve and allows St. Pierre to use his Colorado supplier in an advisory role.

Launching a start-up on a reservation is a struggle. There are no banks on the reservation, and because land is often tribalowned or in trust, outside banks are hesitant to loan to Native Americans with few assets. The high-school graduation rate for Shannon County hovers around 7 percent, making for a largely untrained workforce. Federal subsidy programs for reservation or low-income areas exist, but access can be slow, tedious and complex.

"They have put tribes in very difficult situations," St. Pierre said. "Writing successful grants for infrastructure projects requires talents and skills that don't exist in most reservation communities or don't exist in small, rural, non-Indian communities."

Walter Hillabrant co-founded Native American Capital outside Washington, D.C., 15 years ago. His company helps tribal communities and businesses structure finances and facilitate development.

"If you don't have a job, a meaningful role in your family - and clan and tribe and country - it is hard to feel good about yourself," Hillabrant said. "And it is easy to do things that are not good for your health and good for your family."

He said investors or businesses considering investing on a reservation may want a waiver of tribal sovereignty in order to have access to federal or state courts. Tribal governments may lack a general business infrastructure, such as zoning regulations, tax policies and commercial codes.

"Complicated things and uncertainty are poison to economic development," Hillabrant said.

Sioux-Preme Wood is now a proving ground on Pine Ridge. One of Cottier's relatives, Patrick Cottier, 32, is a shop worker at Sioux-Preme and said friends ask jealously, "You're working?"

"If I work here long enough, maybe my kids can work here," Patrick Cottier said. "To find something close to home, that is Recently, St. Pierre spent hours with a government auditor affirming he is following the grant terms. He said few people believed his vision would come this far, and he remains determined to succeed.

"The young Native people of western South Dakota are the largest untapped economic possibility that South Dakota has," he said. "People need to start thinking in the long term."

American Indian actors. In 1999, a history teacher and former curator at the Museum of the Western Prairie in Altus, Leo Kelley, wrote an article for the OHS publication Chronicles of Oklahoma based on a collection of 36 photos he found in the museum's archives. The photos were production still images from The Daughter of Dawn. When he found the original script in the Library of Congress, he wrote about how a Virginia man named Norbert Myles began a film career by directing and writing a handful of action thrillers beginning in 1916. By the 1920s, Myles was in California looking for projects. With Richard E. Banks and the Texas Film Company, he filmed six-reel movies in the Wichita Mountains Wildlife Refuge near Lawton. It was a love story, an action flick and a drama with epic ambitions that starred men and women from the Comanche and Kiowa people living on the nearby reservations.

By Oct. 17, 1920, the film was screened at College Theatre in Los Angeles and called an "original and breath-taking adventure" by one critic, according to the article.

a private detective in North Carolina had the complete film and was looking for a buyer. He had received it as payment for a job and wanted about $30,000. The OHS couldn't afford it, Moore said, and had to pass. A few more years passed, though, and the seller came down to $7,000. efforts include along with the transfer With donations from the Lawton to 35 mm safety film, scan and Community Foundation and the standard definition DVD copy both McMahon Foundation of Lawton, the negative and positive prints of the film was purchased and left the garage it had been housed in temporarily.

The Oklahoma Historical Society plans to release the 1920 film The Daughter of Dawn on DVD in 2013. The silent picture was filmed in the Wichita Mountains Wildlife Refuge near Lawton and starred Kiowa and Comanche actors in all the roles. The film was found completely intact in 2004 in North Carolina.

the National Film Preservation Foundation (NFPF), which referred it to a restoration lab for estimates to save the film and its contents. Then, OHS applied for a NFPF grant to fund the project.

During the process, restorers found In 2004, the society was notified that the "lost" sixth reel. Inter-titles, the text cards which explain the scene or quotes spoken by the characters placed throughout the film, were taken out of the version acquired by OHS. Added back in, the film is brought up to its 87-minute run time.

Provisions required that restoration frames.

When composer David Yeagley "We didn't know what to expect signed on to compose a music score to accompany The Daughter of Dawn, he watched it without any music. The images stayed with him.

> "I was kind of stunned by it," Yeagley said of viewing it for the first time.

Throw in acts of betrayal, a battle with the Comanche and a buffalo hunt bonded with intimate scenes between the main characters, and The Daughter of Dawn becomes a challenge for any composer.

> Robert Blackburn, executive director of the OHS, commissioned Yeagley to do the job in 2007. The following summer, he gave Blackburn and the society a composition of 80plus minutes of nonstop music, which had to printed into sheet music for each part of the orchestra.

With The Daughter of Dawn, Yeagley said he wanted to use harmonies and chords that were both familiar and strange to the ear. Excepting an Indian flute played as the character Daughter's theme, Yeagley did not use any instrument heard in traditional American Indian music. Other characters have their musical themes. To Red Wing he gave a piano solo. To Yeagley, she is perhaps the most meaningful character in the

"Her love is most pure in the story," he said.

To the film preservationists and historians at the OHS, The Daughter of Dawn is as important a testament of culture as it is a piece of Oklahoma art treasure. Costumes were not made for the film, and set pieces and stage props were not constructed as far as anyone knows. The Kiowa and Comanche people playing the roles wore their own special regalia, brought their own horses (usually sans saddle) too much about it, but the hanging and towed in their teepee lodges for question was what would Indian the film. "How many of us have footage of our parents or our great-grandparents?" asked Jeff Moore, project director of the proposed Oklahoma POP Museum.

The film was shown during the deadCENTER Film Festival in Oklahoma City in June and was presented in Lawton on Oct. 11. The society is now applying for grants to scan the film into a 2K digital format that improves on even the HD (high definition) format. It is this version the society hopes to show at theaters, screen at film festivals and release to DVD next year with added features.

The Daughter of Dawn is exactly the kind of element Jeff Moore said the Oklahoma POP Museum will feature to demonstrate the influence Oklahoma and the Midwest have had on American and international culture. As a hall of that preservation, "orphan films" (films that no longer have a parent company - there are no remnants of the Texas Film Company) have a place for safekeeping.

"Outside of Hollywood produced films, less than 2 percent of all independent films still exist," Jeff Moore said. "This is 87 minutes, and it's all there. It's a pretty significant story."

Appeal of Indian land trust settlement rejected

HELENA, Mont. (AP) – The U.S. Supreme Court won't consider a Colorado woman's challenge of a $3.4 billion settlement between the federal government and Native American land trust beneficiaries.

The settlement was reached in 2009 following years of litigation in which Montana resident Elouise Cobell, who is now deceased, argued government officials mismanaged billions of dollars in land royalties held in trust for Native Americans.

Court records show Kimberly Craven's petition asking the Supreme Court to review the settlement was denied Oct. 29. She had argued the settlement enriched the attorneys and the named plaintiffs led by Cobell.

The named plaintiffs' attorneys said Wednesday that three other people have agreed to dismiss their appeals in exchange for having their attorneys' fees and expenses paid, so settlement funds are closer to getting distributed.

Native candidates win big in Okla.

OKLAHOMA CITY - Several Native American candidates won big in the race to the Oklahoma legislature.

Among the winning incumbents was Rep. Skye McNiel (R-Bristow), who defeated Democratic challenger David Narcomey for the second straight election in the only house race contested by two tribal citizens.

McNiel, a citizen of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation, earned more than 76 percent of the votes cast in District 29 to defeat Narcomey, a citizen of the Seminole Nation.

"This speaks well for Natives," she said about her district's all-Indian ballot. "This shows that we're out there, we're productive and we want to contribute."

Will Fourkiller, a Cherokee Nation citizen from Stilwell, Okla., was elected to another term from District 86, defeating Republican challenger Russell Don Turner by more than 4,000 votes. With 14,352 Native American residents, District 86 has the highest percentage and overall number of Native Americans of any state house district.

Seneca Scott, a citizen of the Choctaw Nation, was re-elected to represent District 72, which starts at the University of Tulsa and stretches north to the community of Turley. Scott received 5,996 votes - more than twice that of his Republican challenger, Randall Reese.

Seminole Nation citizen and fellow incumbent Anastasia Pittman (D-Oklahoma City) was re-elected by an even wider margin, defeating

NCAI touts success of Native vote push

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) -Organizers of a massive get-out-thevote campaign that targeted Native American communities across the country are considering their efforts a success.

The National Congress of American Indians led the push. The group pointed Thursday to U.S. Senate races in Montana and North Dakota, as well as a voter identification ballot initiative in Minnesota, where it says the Native American turnout made a difference. The Minnesota voter ID requirement failed.

NCAI Executive Director Jackie Johnson Pata says the best indicator was the fact that President Barack

Obama mentioned Native Americans during his victory speech Tuesday night. She called that a "huge leap" for Indian Country.

It's difficult to say at this point exactly how many American Indians and Alaska Natives showed up to the polls. But NCAI officials say Native Americans in New Mexico and Montana were registered to vote at higher rates than any other racial or ethnic group in those states heading into Election Day.

Judge rebuffs Northerr Arapaho in eagle case

■ The Eastern Shoshone Tribe is satisfied the judge ruled that the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has an obligation to support the practices of both tribes.

CHEYENNE, Wyo. (AP) - A federal judge has ruled that the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service acted properly in prohibiting the Northern Arapaho Tribe from killing bald eagles for religious purposes on its central Wyoming reservation.

Tribes, Western Delaware, Wichita and Affiliated Tribes, Kiowa, Comanche and Apache tribes.

The federal wildlife agency earlier this year granted the Northern Arapaho the nation's first permit allowing it to kill up to two bald eagles a year for religious purposes. But the Arapaho challenged the agency's requirement that the eagles couldn't be killed on the Wind River Indian Reservation because of objections from the Eastern Shoshone Tribe, which shares the reservation.

U.S. District Judge Alan B. Johnson of Cheyenne entered his ruling against the Northern Arapaho Tribe Nov. 5. The judge said the Northern Arapaho could pursue further legal action against the federal government claiming that restrictions against killing eagles on the reservation violates the tribe's religious rights.

Johnson wrote that allowing the Northern Arapaho Tribe to take eagles within the reservation wouldn't advance the Fish and Wildlife Service's "compelling interest in fostering and protecting the Eastern Shoshone's culture and religion and would throw the balance between the Fish and Wildlife Service's compelling interests out of whack."

OSSAA rules Sequoyah to forfeit wins, title and berth

■ Under OSSAA recommendations, Sequoyah is prohibited from conducting spring football practice during next semester. The team cannot conduct team clinics during summer 2013 and players are not allowed to participate in any 7-on-7 passing league teams.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

OKLAHOMA CITY – The athletic eligibility of 11 Sequoyah High School football players was restored Wednesday after questions of improper benefits led to forfeitures and court hearings.

In October, the Oklahoma Secondary Schools Activities Association announced 12 Sequoyah High School football players were ineligible to compete because the school paid for them to attend athletic camps. Under OSSAA policy, schools, coaches, booster clubs and non-family members are prohibited from paying for student-athletes to attend camps or the associated costs, such as travel.

Despite a Cherokee County judge granting an injunction to allow the student-athletes to compete in the season's final weeks, the board ultimately ruled that they were ineligible. The school forfeited the football team's nine wins, its district title and berth in the Class 3A playoffs.

Wednesday's decision allows 11 of the students to participate in other sports during the 2012-2013 school year, including basketball, baseball, track and wrestling.

 $Senior\,quarter back\,Brayden\,Scott$ was the lone exception. No reason was given during Wednesday's hearing as to why he was singled out. Scott is the the son of Sequoyah coach Brent Scott, who is currently on administrative leave.

Represented by former Cherokee Principal Chief Chad Smith, Scott's legal challenge filed in Cherokee County District Court was denied Thursday. The Oklahoma Supreme Court declined to hear his appeal Friday.

"Sequoyah is not a stand-alone charter school," former Cherokee Nation Principal Chief Chad Smith said. "It is a program of the Bureau of Indian Education and the Department of Interior.

"Looking at this policy, governments are not prohibited from paying camp fees."

Cherokee Nation operates the school through a contract with the Bureau of Indian Education.

Along with the eligibility reinstatement of 11 students, the board also approved seven recommendations for the school's athletic department effective immediately.

Under the recommendations, Sequoyah is prohibited from conducting spring football practice during next semester. The team cannot conduct team clinics during summer 2013 and players are not allowed to participate in any 7-on-7 passing league teams.

The team is not allowed to participate in any inter-school scrimmages before the start of the 2013 season.

Sequoyah High School is now on warning status for two years. If additional serious rule violations are committed during the next two years, the school could be placed on probation or suspended from OSSAA membership.

The school is required to complete an operational audit by Jan. 14, 2013, of all sports programs to determine whether any other students are ineligible, whether coaches are knowledgeable and complying with policies and what institutional policy changes are necessary to ensure compliance with OSSAA rules.

The school is asked to reimburse OSSAA attorneys' fees up to $25,000.

The board also requested that coach Scott be formally suspended from all coaching duties for a year from all OSSAA member schools. His individual appeal has been deferred to the board's December meeting.

Former athletic director Larry Grigg is also formally suspended from holding any athletic director responsibilities for a year from all OSSAA member schools.

Either would have to seek reinstatement from the OSSAA board.

Additionally, all current students whose individual camp expenses were paid by the school are now required to repay the school or show documentation of their financial inability to do. Payment plans and waivers can be considered but have to be discussed with the OSSAA before being implemented.

"I don't like to punish kids," OSSAA board member Mike Kellogg said before a standing room only crowd at the board's headquarters. "However, life is not always fair. This is not any fun."

"In light of all the circumstances, this was a very fair hearing," Sequoyah athletic director Marcus Crittenden said. "They have been more lenient than they could have been."

the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service last year, saying the federal agency had delayed too long in acting on its application for a permit to kill eagles. The Eastern Shoshone Tribe intervened, saying it has an undivided interest in all the eagles on the Wind River Indian Reservation and wanted them alive.

The federal permit the Northern Arapaho received this year specified that they could only kill eagles off the reservation. However, the State of Wyoming prohibits anyone from killing eagles off the reservation and tribal members said the situation left them empty-handed.

Andy Baldwin, lawye

Andy Baldwin, lawyer for the Northern Arapaho, told Johnson at a court hearing in September that tribal members' religious beliefs require them to kill eagles for their Sun Dance. He said they need "clean eagles," and that it would be unacceptable to use eagle carcasses or body parts available from a federal repository, which collects birds killed by power lines or other causes.

Attempts to reach Baldwin for comment Tuesday on Johnson's ruling were unsuccessful.

Kimberly Varilek, attorney general for the Eastern Shoshone Tribe and a member of the tribe, said Tuesday that she expected the Northern Arapaho Tribe to appeal Johnson's ruling.

"I think that the most important thing that the judge ruled on, obviously not just upholding the permit in its current form, but recognizing the difficulty of trying to find a least-restrictive solution that can accommodate both tribes," Varilek said. "The judge pointed out again that it is the United States' responsibility to consider both tribes' interest here."

Varilek said the Eastern Shoshone Tribe is satisfied that Johnson ruled that the federal agency has an obligation to support the practices of both tribes. "I would have to say that when the two tribes can't find resolution, we end up going before a third party and they try to apply the laws in the best way possible, and I think that they did that in this case," she said.

High court to take fresh look at voting rights law

MARK SHERMAN Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – The Supreme Court will consider eliminating the government's most potent weapon against racial discrimination at polling places since the 1960s. The court acted three days after a diverse coalition of voters propelled President Barack Obama to a second term in the White House.

With a look at affirmative action in higher education already on the agenda, the court is putting a spotlight on race by re-examining the ongoing necessity of laws and programs aimed at giving racial minorities access to major areas of American life from which they once were systematically excluded.

"This is a term in which many core pillars of civil rights and pathways to opportunity hang in the balance," said Debo Adegbile, acting president and director-counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

In an order Nov. 9, the justices agreed to hear a constitutional challenge to the part of the landmark Voting Rights Act that requires all or parts of 16 states with a history of discrimination in voting to get federal approval before making any changes in the way they hold elections.

The high court considered the same issue three years ago but sidestepped what Chief Justice John Roberts then called "a difficult constitutional question."

The new appeal from Shelby County, Ala., near Birmingham, says state and local governments covered by the law have made significant progress and no longer should be forced to live under oversight from Washington.

"The America that elected and re-elected Barack Obama as its first African-American president is far different than when the Voting Rights Act was first enacted in 1965. Congress unwisely reauthorized a bill that is stuck in a Jim Crow-era time warp. It is unconstitutional," said Edward Blum, director of the not-for-profit Project on Fair Representation, which is funding the challenges to the voting rights law and affirmative action.

But defenders of the law said there is a continuing need for it and pointed to the Justice Department's efforts to block voter ID laws in South Carolina and Texas, as well as a redistricting plan in Texas that a federal court found discriminated against the state's large and growing Hispanic population. "What we know even more clearly now than we did when the court last considered this question is that a troubling strain of obstructing the path to the ballot box remains a part of our society," Adegbile said.

Since the court's decision 2009, Congress has potential addressed problems identified by the court. Meanwhile, the law's opponents sensed its vulnerability and filed several new lawsuits.

Addressingthosechallenges, lower courts have concluded that a history of discrimination and more recent efforts to harm minority voters justify continuing federal oversight.

The justices said they will examine whether the formula under which states are covered is outdated because it relies on 40-year-old data. By some measures, states covered by the law are outperforming some that are not.

Last week's election results also provide an interesting backdrop for the court's action. Americans re-elected the nation's first African-American president. Exit polls across the country indicated Obama won the votes of more than 70 percent of Hispanics and more than 90 percent of blacks. In Alabama, however, the exit polls showed Obama won only about 15 percent of the state's white voters. In neighboring Mississippi, the numbers were even smaller, at 10 percent, the surveys found.

The case probably will be argued in February or March, with a decision expected by late June.

The advance approval, or preclearance requirement, was adopted in the Voting Rights Act in 1965 to give federal officials a potent tool to defeat persistent efforts to keep blacks from voting.

The provision was a huge success, and Congress periodically has renewed it over the years. The most recent occasion was in 2006, when a Republican-led Congress overwhelmingly approved and President George W. Bush signed a 25-year extension.

The requirement currently applies to the states of Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia. It also covers certain counties in California, Florida, New York, North Carolina and South Dakota, and some local jurisdictions in Michigan and New Hampshire. Coverage has been triggered by past discrimination not only against blacks, but also against American Indians, Asian-Americans, Alaskan Natives and Hispanics.

Before these locations can change their voting rules, they must get approval either from the U.S. Justice Department's civil rights division or from the federal district court in Washington that the new rules won't discriminate.

Congress compiled a 15,000-page record and documented hundreds of instances of apparent voting discrimination in the states covered by the law dating to 1982, the last time it had been extended.

Six of the affected states, Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, South Carolina, South Dakota and Texas, are backing Shelby County's appeal.

In 2009, Roberts indicated the court was troubled about the ongoing need for a law in the face of dramatically improved conditions, including increased minority voter registration and turnout rates. Roberts attributed part of the change to the law itself. "Past success alone, however, is not adequate justification to retain the preclearance requirements," he said.

Jurisdictions required to obtain preclearance were chosen based on whether they had a test restricting the opportunity to register or vote and whether they had a voter registration or turnout rate below 50 percent.

A divided panel of federal appeals court judges in Washington said that the age of the information being used is less important than whether it helps identify jurisdictions with the worst discrimination problems.

Shelby County, a well-todo, mostly white bedroom community near Birmingham, adopted Roberts' arguments in its effort to have the voting rights provision declared unconstitutional.

Yet just a few years earlier, a town of nearly 12,000 people in Shelby County defied the voting rights law and prompted the intervention of the Bush Justice Department.

Ernest Montgomery won election as the only black member of the five-person Calera City Council in 2004 in a district that was almost 71 percent black. The city redrew its district lines in 2006 after new subdivisions and retail developments sprang up in the area Montgomery represented, and the change left his district with a population that was only 23 percent black.

Running against a white opponent in the now mostly white district, Montgomery narrowly lost a re-election bid in 2008. The Justice Department invalidated the election result because the city had failed to obtain advance approval of the new districts.

The case is Shelby County v. Holder, 12-96.

Anthony Bennett has been in custody on another charge since Carnel Chamberlain's remains were found in June at a home on the Saginaw Chippewa Indian reservation, about 70 miles north of Lansing. He was living with Carnel and the boy's mother.

Bennett is charged with first-degree murder, assault of a child, assault with a dangerous weapon, animal cruelty and witness tampering.

"We're not surprised," defense attorney

Anthony Chambers said. "We'll go forward and defend the case."

Carnel was last seen alive on June 21 when his mother went to work and left him in Bennett's care. A weeklong search on the reservation ensued until the remains were found buried outside the home.

Bennett was subsequently charged with an earlier assault on the boy, a key step that kept him in custody while authorities developed the murder case against him. The FBI and federal prosecutors investigate crimes committed on Indian land.

American Indian Veteran's National Memorial to be dedicated Nov. 14 at Heard Museum

■ Large-scale outdoor plaza features life-size sculpture and descriptive panels on up to 15-foot concrete walls

MARK SCARP Heard Museum News Release

PHOENIX – Service and sacrifice spanning more than three centuries will be honored in the first and only known national memorial to American Indian veterans of many conflicts to be dedicated at a public ceremony Nov. 14 at the Heard Museum in Phoenix that will feature remarks by the only living American Indian recipient of the Medal of

The American Indian Veterans National Memorial contains 120 feet of concrete walls up to 15 feet tall bearing several panels describing the devotion of American Indian warriors to their country. The panels will include a special tribute to American Indians who received the Medal of Honor.

The memorial is being completed while two exhibits on the contributions of American Indian code talkers – one from the Smithsonian Institution – are on display inside the museum.

Medal of Honor recipient Lt. Michael Edwin Thornton (Cherokee), a retired Navy SEAL who served in the Vietnam War, and retired Army Lt. Col. Joey Strickland (Choctaw), director of the Arizona Department of Veterans Services, are among several speakers scheduled to address the 5 p.m. gathering at the monument.

Thornton received the medal in 1973 for the lifesaving rescue of his senior officer the previous year. He is one of only 15 U.S. Navy personnel to have received the Medal of Honor for heroic conduct during the Vietnam War. Strickland, awarded the Legion of Merit, was appointed director in July 2008. He served in the Vietnam War in 1967-1968 with the 1st Air Cavalry Division, and in a second Vietnam combat tour in 1970-1971 with the First Aviation Brigade as a crew chief and door gunner on a UH-1H helicopter.

The American Indian Veterans National Memorial has been a longtime dream of many American Indian veterans' groups. According to the Department of Defense, in 2010, 22,569 enlisted service members and 1,297 officers on active duty were of American Indian heritage. While 1.4 percent of the U.S. population is American Indian, 1.7 percent of the military is American Indian, making it the highest per-capita commitment of any ethnic population to defend the United States.

The project, designed by Scottsdale-based John Douglas Architects, is being funded by a gift from TriWest Healthcare Alliance. Construction services are provided by Kitchell Construction. The ceremony is funded by APS.

MEMORIAL COMPONENTS

The memorial is a permanent large-scale outdoor plaza located on the west-facing edge of the museum's gift shop next to the Berlin Gallery. It consists of sculptures by two Native artists, Chiricahua Apache sculptor Allan Houser (1914-1994) and Michael Naranjo (Santa Clara Pueblo), a Vietnam War veteran who suffered an injury that rendered him blind. Naranjo has been carving his meant-to-be-touched sculptures by feel ever since.

Several bronze-colored panels detail the story of American Indians in conflicts from the 17th century to the 21st century and pays tribute to American Indians who received the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest military decoration.

The panels' descriptions begin with these words:

"The story of American Indian Warriors begins before there was a United States of America, and the Warrior Tradition continues rich and strong today. Honoring Warrior leaders is also a tradition that is an integral part of the story. In this spirit, the Heard Museum joins with those who keep the honoring tradition and tell the stories of bravery and sacrifice."

A water feature will complete the memorial, which is designed to be a long-term exhibit at the Heard.

One panel contains a poem, "Do Not Stand at My Grave and Weep,"written by Mary Elizabeth Frye in 1932 and has endured for 80 years. It has been translated into many languages and set to music by many composers. It has comforted people around the world and did so at a memorial service for Lori Piestewa. Her family offers it to the American Indian Veterans National Memorial:

Another panel contains a drawing and accompanying poem, "The Fear of Bo-talee," by author N. Scott Momaday (Kiowa), from his 1992 book, In the Presence of the Sun: Stories and Poems, 1961-1991.

OTHER SPEAKERS

Other speakers at the Nov. 14 ceremony include American Indian veterans George Blue Spruce Jr. (Ohkay Owingeh/Laguna Pueblo) and Wayne Mitchell (Dakota Sioux/Mandan), both members of the Heard Museum's Board of Trustees and of the museum's American Indian Advisory Committee. David J. McIntyre, president and CEO of TriWest Healthcare Alliance, will also make remarks, as well as Heard Museum Board of Trustees Chair Mark Bonsall and board Vice-Chair Lee Peterson, the museum's interim

Besides Blue Spruce and Mitchell, a third American Indian veteran serves on the Heard Museum Board of Trustees. Chris Deschene (Navajo), a U.S. Naval Academy graduate, served in the U.S. Marine Corps in several overseas tours to Southeast Asia and the Middle East in the 1990s before retiring with the rank of captain. Deschene was also the 2010 Democratic nominee for Arizona secretary of state.

The Heard is displaying Native Words, Native Warriors, a Smithsonian exhibit about the contributions of American Indians of several tribes whose use of their native languages enabled the United States to safely transmit military messages in World Wars I and II. With this exhibit is another, Navajo Code Talkers: Photographs by Kenji Kawano, a pictorial series documenting the lives of Navajo veterans who were World War II code talkers.

our operations into this area of the state," Lance said. "After careful consideration we decided expansion into this area would enable us to offer more job opportunities and entertainment options that would benefit everyone concerned."

While there is no real boundary marking the east side of Oklahoma from the west, Interstate 35 is regarded as a black top dividing line separating the state's 38 federally recognized tribes in two broad categories. Pocasset marks one of the western-most boundaries on lands given to the tribe after relocation to Oklahoma from their homelands in Mississippi during the 1830s, officials said.

Prior to Pocasset, the tribe developed in decidedly eastern Oklahoma with casinos sitting as far south as their evergreen WinStar Casino in Thackerville, Okla., near the Texas border and skirting the metropolitan Oklahoma City area with their Riverwind Casino. The 37,000-sq.ft. Salt Creek development reflects the Chickasaw's effort to solidify their presence within every direction of their original jurisdiction, officials said.

"This new enterprise will offer new entertainment options which could significantly increase tourism in the area," said Chickasaw governor, Bill Anoatubby. "We are pleased to be part of the communities in Grady County and are happy about increasing that presence."

Chickasaw officials point out that the tribe has run a senior nutrition site in nearby Chickasha for several years. They consider the new casino to be in investment for their tribal business portfolio, officials said.

The city of Pocasset is laying out the welcome mat for the tribe's new gaming site. Christie Rainey, Pocasset's mayor, said her small province (pop. 158), has a convenience store, truck bed manufacturer and an oilfield company division and that's about it. She views Salt Creek as an opportunity, she said.

"This way, folks won't have to drive," the mayor said, referring to the casino's two planned restaurants."It offers opportunities to get employed and they pay for the skills training."

The state's Indian gaming behemoth continues to flex its economic muscles and not just on the home front. Chickasaw recently made bids to purchase two bankrupt casino properties in Louisiana and Mississippi through the tribe's gaming arm, Global Gaming Solutions. Additionally, Global Gaming Solutions operates Remington Park, a non-Indian racetrack in Oklahoma City.

Grady County is on cue to be the tribe's next locale for tribal gaming. The Salt Creek Casino will draw from an area market shared by tribal casinos owned by the Cheyenne & Arapaho Tribes, Western Delaware, Wichita and Affiliated Tribes, Kiowa, Comanche and Apache tribes.

Salt Creek Casino is expected to be finished in early December 2012, officials said.

Pocasset is roughly an hour drive southwest of Oklahoma City, 25 miles south from El Reno on state Highway 81.

Tribal nursery focuses on state's native plants

GALE FIEGE Everett Herald

ARLINGTON, Wash. (AP) – Banksavers Nursery is the state's only tribal-owned native plant nursery, and one of the few around that focuses solely on plants native to Western Washington.

Operated by the Stillaguamish Tribe of Indians, Banksavers evolved from educational and social efforts to engage tribal members in learning about native plants and their traditional uses. Then it became a program in which the tribe grew native plants for its own salmon habitat projects, establishing wetlands and forests to mitigate for the tribe's development in the county.

After other jurisdictions began contracting for Banksaver plants and landscaping services, the tribe decided to step out as a wholesale and retail operation.

A few years ago, the tribe bought a former alpaca farm north of Arlington and moved its greenhouses up from the tribe's property along the Stillaguamish River. The business is located at 25525 Dahl Road, which runs along the east side of I-5 just south of the Stanwood exit.

The 135-acre farm overlooks the Pilchuck Creek canyon on one side. Banksavers has four large greenhouses, potting sheds, landscaping materials and equipment and acres of 63 species of native plants potted up in neat rows. At full capacity, the pesticide-free, organic nursery has space for a half million plants. The operation, which gives preference to tribal members, employs 14 people.

Stillaguamish tribal member Martin Allen has worked at the nursery for about four years.

"It's great to work for the tribe and great that the tribe owns this nursery," Allen said. "And sometimes the work is more than just work. It's heartfelt when we plant cedar trees."

Western red cedars are one of the most important plants to Coast Salish tribes, who depended on the trees for canoes, clothing, homes and spiritual uses.

Banksavers director Mike Simpier and his assistant manager Steven Huntley are focusing now on the promotion of the retail and landscaping side of the business. Autumn is a good time to plant natives in residential gardens, Simpler said.

"Summer isn't the best time, and it especially wasn't during that long stretch we just had without rain," Simpier said. "But now is a great time, with high rates of longevity and plant health. The thing about native plants is that eventually you won't have to water them. And they're good for the birds."

Plants sold in one-gallon or two-gallon pots go for from $5 to $10, with less expensive prices for wholesale orders. Historically, the Stillaguamish Tribe's nursery focused on salmon habitat restoration, which the tribe has done voluntarily throughout the Stillaguamish River watershed in partnership with regional nonprofits. Riverbanks have been saved from erosion, stabilized with the use of native plants.

Jeff Payne, the nursery's mitigation specialist, has spent the past seven years with Banksavers learning about restoration of clearcut areas, drainage, salmon habitat and natural beauty.

"Our focus is to emulate nature and restore places to their native beauty and purpose," Payne said.

"Washington state has strict wetland legislation and we can help ensure that the laws are satisfied."

Currently, Banksavers is doing some mitigation work for the state Department of Transportation, which plans to replace the one-lane bridge across Pilchuck Creek on Highway 9, work that can't be done without disturbing some of the creekside habitat.

Christine Woodward, director of natural resources for the Samish Tribe in Anacortes, praised Banksavers for its hard work and healthy plants, which can be found throughout the Samish property on Fidalgo Island.

Her sentiment was echoed by Mike Baden, property manager for the Pierce Conservation District in Puyallup.

"They do good restoration work. The conservation district bought an old dairy farm down here so we could buffer a creek and provide for riparian habitat," Baden said. "Banksavers was the only business who could provide all the plants we needed and travel to us to get the work done."

An Indian voted Republican? The sky is falling!

Notes from Indian Country

TIM GIAGO (Nanwica Kciji) © 2012 Unity South Dakota

Holy GOP! I did the unthinkable! I'm Native American and I voted for a Republican!

No, I didn't vote for Mitt Romney. Now that would have been unthinkable. But to read the criticism I got from my fellow Native Americans one would have thought I committed a mortal sin.

I was very concerned about the lackadaisical approach to economic development on the Indian reservations of South Dakota by Matt Varilek, the Democrat who ran against the incumbent for the lone seat in Congress, Kristi Noem.

Varilek served on the staff of Senator Tim Johnson (D-SD) and one of his responsibilities was to work with Native American tribes in the area of economic development. About one year ago I spoke at length with Varilek because South Dakota is notorious for having four counties in America's top ten poorest counties. In the 1980 Census, Shannon County, in the heart of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. was proclaimed the "poorest county in America."

With the economic fate of South Dakota's nine Indian reservations in the hands of elected Democrats in the House and in the Senate for the past 40 years I had to ask myself, and Varilek, why is this so?

Varilek never ran a business. As far as I know, neither have any of the elected Democrats serving the reservations for the past 40 years. I questioned Varilek about why he thought he was getting a handle on business development and jobs on the Indian reservations when all he was doing was getting funds put into the accounts of non-profit organizations with leaders who also never ran a business in their lives.

He became very defensive when I pointed out to him that none of this was working. Since the death of the "earmark" South Dakota's Congressional delegation has not been able to direct funds to any worthwhile project on the reservations.

President Bill Clinton had the right idea when he declared that the Pine Ridge Reservation was in an Empowerment Zone. This would give the tribal leaders the opportunity to find investors by offering incentives conducive to getting a foothold on the reservation. With certain tax incentives Clinton believed that major corporations would see this as a business opportunity. Since the unemployment rate on this reservation of nearly 40,000 people was at about 80 percent, an investor would find plenty of readily available employees.

The Empowerment Zone was handed $10 million over a 10 year period that should have been used to entice established businesses to relocate to the reservation. Instead the tribal leaders put a man in charge that had never run a business in his life and the results of this experiment were predetermined. The $10 million evaporated and not a single business was enticed to build on the reservation and worse yet, not a single business was constructed internally. Instead the money was handed out in loans and grants without accountability. individuals got loans that were never repaid and others were given grants that simply disappeared. My space here is limited, but it got worse.

The same can be said of the multitude of non-profit organizations supposedly designed to assist in the establishment of small businesses. Most of the money is eaten up in administrative costs and again, there is no accountability. I asked Varilek to tell me how many businesses were started by the non-profit organizations he supposedly helped to fund and he had no answer.

I then spoke to our lone member of Congress, Kristi Noem. Now Noem is an experienced business woman. She and her husband have run successful farm and ranch operations and she knows how a business is run. I have also run successful businesses.

my newspaper operations without a single government grant. Early on I got a loan from the Small Business Administration as a military veteran and paid back every penny of that loan. I also worked with our local banks to secure loans as they were needed for growth and paid back all of those loans. I am Native American and was born and raised on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. All many prospective Lakota entrepreneurs need is the opportunity.

Rep. Noem understood immediately what I was saying and was determined to make things happen. She has been criticized, by Democrats mostly, for having the audacity to accept farm and ranch subsidies from the United States government, but then so have thousands of other ranchers. But she knew how to make those subsidies work and she also knew that the one source of money that could be available to Native businesses should come from the local

As a rule most Indians do not have the collateral or the credit rating to secure loans from banks and they cannot use the land they own as collateral because it is held in trust by the Department of the Interior.

Rep. Noem and I discussed the possibilities of moving in a different direction than the stagnant methods used by the Democrats who had been in power for so many years. As two people who have built successful businesses (I started my first business on the Pine Ridge Reservation) we have some good ideas and once the dust has settled from the past election, we will meet to discuss them.

So why did I vote for a Republican? Because the reservations are ready for a change and I felt Rep. Noem could provide it. And incidentally, I am a registered Independent.

Tim Giago, an Oglala Lakota, was born and raised on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. He was the founder and first president of the Native American Journalists Association, a Nieman Fellow at Harvard, and he was inducted into the South Dakota Newspaper Hall of Fame in 2007 and is the recipient of the H.L. Mencken Award.

Choctaw college program continues to aim high

■ Among the new schools attending this year's Ivy League and Friends event are UCLA, Bowdoin College, University of Maryland law school and Gonzaga law school.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

DURANT, Okla. - It started in 2006 with a simple directive: open some college doors for Choctaw high school students.

Deciding to go big, Jo McDonald, the senior director of the Choctaw Nation's Scholarship Advisement Program, aimed high and talked a recruiter from Harvard University's Native American Program into coming to the Red River valley for the first Ivy League and Friends event in 2007. The Cambridge, Mass., school was the only institution to attend.

"He (the recruiter) took a chance and came to Durant," she said. "To my knowledge, Harvard had never been that far south. That's how successful things happen - you take risks."

The risk paid off.

"We were hoping for maybe 25-30 students, which would have been a huge crowd," she said. "We had more than 150 that first year. We thought we would have been there for a couple of hours. Instead, we were there until after midnight.

"From that, we were pretty sure we were on to something."

Fast forward five years, and Harvard had company at the Choctaw Casino Resort Saturday at this year's Ivy League and Friends.

"Among the new schools attending this year are UCLA, Bowdoin College, University of Maryland law school and Gonzaga law school,"

Choctaw SAP college coordinator prep Stephanie Gardner said. "Participation is by invitation only. We put a lot of thought into the schools we extended invites to." As of Nov. 8, almost 400 Choctaw and Chickasaw students were registered for this year's event, which featured breakout sessions on applying for college, entrance exams such as the SAT, and finding and applying for financial aid. Originally only for Choctaw citizens looking into undergraduate programs, event opened up to Chickasaw students and potential graduate professional degree candidates last year. Among the other schools participating are Yale, Dartmouth, the University of Pennsylvania, Johns Hopkins, Duke and Emory.

"This is going to help Native Americans across the board," McDonald said. "If we can do the right thing and get our people educated, even better."

Along with the tribe's career services office, the Scholarship Advisement Program co-hosts a second college fair each year for students considering less competitive schools, such as Oklahoma's regional universities, the University of Oklahoma and Oklahoma State University. Those students are still encouraged to come to the Ivy League and Friends event to get a better grasp on the application process and to plan ahead for graduate school.

"It's important to show our kids that they're wanted," Gardner said. "They're striving higher now that they know that this is an option. Harvard isn't quite as intimidating when they can put a face to it."

And the school that started it all - Harvard - came back for a fifth consecutive year Saturday, as representatives for undergraduate admissions and five graduate programs made the trek.

"Absolutely, we've undergraduate students through the program (Ivy League and Friends) who got in," said Dr. Dennis Norman, faculty chairman of the Harvard University Native American Program. "I've met other students who got into graduate or professional school because of it. I can't remember the stats, but considering it is very competitive, this event has been very successful. We get on average about 20 Native students in per year and the Choctaws have always been in the

Depp gives $25K to Navajo Nation for scholarships

FARMINGTON, N.M. (AP) - Actor Johnny Depp filmed scenes in New Mexico for an upcoming movie and now has given the Navajo Nation $25,000 for scholarships.

Tribal president Ben Shelly accepted the donation and the Navajo Nation's Health Education and Human Services Committee voted to accept the money so it can be appropriated for vocational scholarships.

Depp's spokesperson says the donation is supposed to be private and no further statement will be released on his behalf.

Depp will play Tonto in the movie version of "The Lone Ranger," which is expected to be in theaters in June.

The Farmington Daily Times reports that the Shiprock monument in New Mexico can be seen in the movie's recently released trailer and Monument Valley near the Arizona-Utah border also is featured.

FLAGSTAFF, Arizona (AP) – Victoria's Secret has apologized for putting a Native Americanstyle headdress on a model for its annual fashion show, after the outfit was criticized as a display of ignorance toward tribal culture and history.

The company responded to the complaints by saying it was sorry to have upset anyone and that it wouldn't include the outfit in the show's television broadcast next month, or in any marketing materials.

"We sincerely apologize as we absolutely had no intention to offend anyone," the company said.

Historically, headdresses are a symbol of respect, worn by Native American war chiefs and warriors. For Great Plains tribes, for instance, each feather placed on a headdress has significance and had to be earned through an act of

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP)

- Native American tribes have received some celebrity support in their effort to raise $9 million by the end of the month to buy land in South Dakota that they consider sacred.

Ezra Miller, who stars in the recently released film "The Perks of Being a Wallflower," and hip-hop producer Sol Guy appear in a short documentary-style film with Standing Rock Sioux tribal member Chase Iron Eyes as part of an effort to raise the final $2 million needed for the land deal.

Tribes of the Great Sioux

Nation hope to buy nearly 2,000 acres in the Black Hills that they call Pe' Sla. The property is important to their creation story, and tribal members have long held ceremonies there. When the land was put up for sale, tribal members worried it would be developed because of its proximity to Mount Rushmore.

The 1,942 acres of pristine prairie grass is the only sacred site on private land currently outside Sioux control.

"I came out here with the intention of being an observer ... I felt kind of removed from the story. But now, it's fairly clear to me that nobody is removed from this story," Miller says in the film. A not-yet-completed mountain carving of the Lakota warrior Crazy Horse can be seen in the background. "This story is central to all of our history and this struggle also cannot be removed. We are all inherently involved in what is going on out here."

Land owners Leonard and Margaret Reynolds cancelled a public auction of the property earlier this year after tribal members expressed outrage. The Reynolds then accepted the tribes' bid to purchase the land for $9 million if they have the money by Nov. 30.

The couple has not spoken publicly about the land sale and did not return a message left Wednesday seeking comment.

Iron Eyes said the tribes have raised more than $7 million so far, and he hopes Miller's and Sol Guy's involvement will help bring in another $1 million or more through a new online campaign. An earlier online campaign raised more than $300,000.

"Last time, it was real grassroots, it just sort of grew on its own fire, its own energy," Iron Eyes said. "But this time we're adding some extra voices to broaden the network."

The 9-minute film was shot over three days in Rapid City and other locations

Fort Sill Apache place sign, make public commitment to return to N.M. homeland

DEMING, N.M. – The sign is right out there for all to see. Tagged by matching cross motifs, the Fort Sill Apache's reservation marker proclaims who owns these 30 acres. Although traffic is not heavy here, the sign serves a purpose; to announce the arrival, or re-arrival, of the Fort Sill Apache to their former territory.

To cue the occasion, Fort Sill Apache tribal members and leaders alike gathered Nov. 16 to celebrate the one-year anniversary of the tribe's reservation designation granted by the U.S. Dept. of Interior. Attendees also watched Apache ceremonial dancing and singing while hearing an update on their return-to-New-Mexico plans.

reservation declaration barely fit a onepage notice in the Federal Register, but to the tribe the official public designation was huge. It symbolized getting their own back, officials said. They decided to put up a literal sign to reflect the solid commitment to return to New Mexico, said Jeff Haozous, Apache chairman.

"Without the sign, people could

Feds detail takeover of tribe's programs

FARGO, N.D. (AP) – The federal Bureau of Indian Affairs said it has handled more than a hundred reports of suspected child abuse or neglect on the Spirit Lake reservation since taking over social services in October.

The bureau assumed control of the tribe's social service programs after criticism that the tribe has failed to protect vulnerable children.

Forum Communications reports that the bureau has new procedures for placing children in foster homes, including ensuring there are documents showing the placement was ordered by a tribal judge.

The bureau also informed the North Dakota congressional delegation on Friday that it has hired a social worker to manage the Spirit Lake Tribe's social services program.

"It's important that the BIA continue to be engaged, and that they keep the public informed about efforts to ensure child safety on the reservation," delegation members said in a statement.

Last week, some members of

Comanche Nation College gains accreditation

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

LAWTON, Okla. — An Oklahoma tribal college is now one step closer to independent accreditation.

On Tuesday, officials with the Comanche Nation College announced via social media that the school is now officially a candidate to receive independent accreditation from the North Central Association of the Higher Learning Commission. It will be eligible to apply for full accreditation in two years and could receive it as early as 2016.

Currently, the college operates a memorandum understanding with Cameron University and a license from the Oklahoma Department of Private Vocational Schools for its CLEET courses. Once it receives full independent accreditation, course credit earned at Comanche Nation College can be transferred to other schools.

In addition to a GED program, the school offers associate's degrees in English, mathematics, natural sciences, American Indian studies, linguistics and Comanche. Degree programs for tribal gaming management, tribal management and business administration are currently in development.

journey has Comanche Nation College four years to accomplish and indeed is an accomplishment to celebrate," president Consuelo Lopez wrote in a letter to the school's community. "This will indeed provide us independence to meet the needs of our community and better serve or people."

Comanche Nation College is the oldest of Oklahoma's four tribal colleges. Courses and degrees offered by the College of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation in Okmulgee, Okla., are accredited through Oklahoma State University Institute of Technology. The Pawnee Nation College in Pawnee, Okla., offers its degrees through Bacone College in Muskogee, Okla. ## Tribal college program teaching Lakota language

■ It is an experimental program at Sitting Bull Community College, a hybrid of specialized day care and a language immersion project. Lunch, playtime and a nap are part of the deal.

LAUREN DONOVAN The Bismarck Tribune

BISMARCK, N.D. (AP) - Tom Red Bird is 61 years old and he eats macaroni and cheese with Elmer's Glue on his fingers, just like a 3-year-

Red Bird is one of the remaining people in the world who can speak Lakota, an indigenous language spoken by Hunkpapa Sioux since time unknown. He spends his days in a large airy room with green plants in the windows among 10 boys and girls, speaking to them only in the ancient language of their ancestors.

Outside the classroom door is a sign with the word "English" stamped out in a red circle.

Other than the English they jabber among themselves, these little ones hear and speak Lakota with Red Bird and the three instructional aides in the room.

Red Bird speaks it fast and fluently since his own childhood on the Cheyenne Indian Reservation in South Dakota. The aides speak it slowly. They, too, are learning as they go.

The children speak it enthusiastically, aided with flash cards or art projects made with glue and cotton balls to learn words for rain and lightning. Their success wrapping their tongues around these new words is applauded and happiness shows on their faces when they

It is an interesting hybrid of specialized day care and a language immersion project. Lunch, playtime and a nap are part of the deal.

"The reason I came here is I want to save my language. It's precious to me. When there came a chance to teach, I jumped at this," Red Bird

He estimates maybe one-third of the reservation is fluent in Lakota. The death of each elder diminishes that number; 10 years ago 80 percent were fluent, he said.

The Lakota language is well documented from the early work of missionaries and later revisions by linguistic experts and tribal members.

Red Bird participated in a Lakota dictionary project, a massive tome with entries both in Lakota to English and English to Lakota. He said he and other Lakota speakers regularly gather to add new words to make it a living, contemporary language.

A recent addition, for example: "Wounspe omnaye;" the words mean "stored language" in Lakota and describe a laptop computer.

Those new words can be a challenge, he says. One suggestion among the group was to describe venetian blinds, in Lakota.

In the classroom, the children are far from the subtleties of window coverings. They have been immersed since September and now have a Lakota vocabulary of about 50 words. They are basic words for the primary colors, the elements of water and clouds, simple foods and Sacheen Whitetail Cross, who earned a master's degree in educational leadership from the University of North Dakota at Grand Forks, is director of the language immersion program. Federal grants fund the project and the initial training for the classroom instructors.

She said the program is licensed as a day care. Parents pay $88 a week - just as they would with day care - to have their child enrolled.

As a student, it was her dream to incorporate language into her work back home on Standing

"It's who we are and it's how we know each other," she said.

Ideally, kids would start even younger and stay immersed for at least several more years.

The project is new and could expand, depending on success and funding, Whitetail

Sarah Jumping Eagle and Chase Iron Eyes live in Bismarck and enrolled their daughter, Azilya Iron Eyes, in the program. Jumping Eagle said it's worth whatever it takes to get their daughter

"I really see in her hope, now. We have a drugand alcohol-free home and she's learning the language and the ceremonies. We're breaking the cycle; that's the hope. We're willing to get up at the crack of dawn to get her there," she said.

Red Bird said Lakota is a language and a way of life lost. Its speakers would be different people if it were their only language.

"They would be more respectful. The language is more sacred with core values. There are no curse words. In the language, it all revolves around the family," he said. He said his own great-grandson, 4, listens and behaves when spoken to in Lakota; to English he closes

For now, Red Bird is pleased to spend days among these pint-sized Lakota learners with their bright eyes and shiny dark hair, helping both the instructors who have prepared lessons and language materials, as well as the children.

"These little ones we've got here, they're the new breed, filling the gap between my age and people in their 40s and 50s who are not fluent," he said.

KAREN SHADE Native American Times

ARAPAHOE, Wyo. - Not long ago, the city of Arapahoe's schools were added to a list of institutions considered floundering because of low standardized test scores. Today, the students have boosted their scores enough to remove Wyoming's Fremont County School District No. 38 elementary and middle schools from the category of "school improvement status."

"We're no longer considered that, said Jonathan Braack, the district superintendent. "The district for many years has struggled to meet AYP for different reasons, but the Fremont County School District 38 went into 'improving district status."

That's because the district made efforts to turn around a downward trend in testing scores.

Fremont County is comprised of more than 9,200 square miles of land in the west central part of Wyoming and has a population of more than 40,000, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. The county extends northwest into both Yellowstone National Park and the Grand Teton National Park. Fremont County is also the historical home of the Wind River Indian Reservation, home of the Eastern Shoshone and Northern Arapaho tribes. The reservation was established in 1868. In 2011, the population was 8,177 Arapaho and 3,737 Shoshone on 1.8 million acres of tribal land.

In 2011, the county's population is estimated to be 20 percent Native American. In school district No. 38, that percentage is even greater about 98 percent of Arapahoe school's students enrolled in kindergarten through 12th grade (435 of them) are citizens of the Arapaho tribe.

Six years ago, Arapahoe Elementary School, Arapahoe Middle School and Arapahoe Charter High School - comprising the 38th school district - acted to boost testing scores of all students, especially those with the lowest scores, said Braack.

"Our schools are in what's called Safe Harbor, it's a holding status," he to schools and districts that are not making targets for Adequate Yearly Progress (AYP) but are making progress in student achievement nonetheless. NCLB requires states to test students annually to measure basic skills in order to receive federal education funding. Scores are used to measure progress and indicate areas where improvement is needed. Accountability and meeting set standards are the hallmarks of NCLB's approach to better education, but Safe Harbor was put into place to help "subgroups," including minority populations and the poor, reach goals.

In Wyoming, schools use the Proficiency Assessments Wyoming Students (PAWS) exam to gauge public education in the state and AYP.

About eight years ago, Braack said, the school district began to decline. Standardized test scores in math, reading and other basic skills dipped. It was the beginning of trend that lasted into the 2010-11 school year when the district was given the NCLB district improvement status. A high employee turn-over rate, inconsistent leadership and "professional isolation" - instructors and individual schools operating with insufficient guidance as to materials and curriculum – are some of the factors that brought about the decline in achievement in reading, writing and math, Braack said.

"Before the turnaround, we didn't have a set curriculum for kindergarten through eighth grade," said Sarah Stoll, an instructional facilitator reading coach who has taught at Arapahoe Elementary for more than 20 years. "There wasn't a consistent base and programs. They were fragmented programs. Kindergarten was doing something different from fourth and fifth grades."

The schools brought their curriculum and materials into alignment by selecting books by the same publisher following a methodology carried through each grade level, making it easier to train instructors and academic coaches when a position was vacated, said Victoria Sherman, principal of Arapahoe Elementary School, which covers grades kindergarten through eighth.

Arapahoe Schools' students celebrate achievement earlier this year after Wyoming's Fremont County School District No. 38 kindergarten through eighth grades made improvements to its Proficiency Assessments for Wyoming Students test scores from the previous school year. Arapahoe's elementary and middle schools have been removed from district improvement status.

With the addition of supplemental and intervention programs, students needing extra individual attention in basic skills such as reading and math get it from reading and math

As a result of these efforts, the students in Arapaho's K-8 classes have made sufficient improvement, Sherman said.

In Wyoming, most schools previously followed their own curriculum and course standards, but like Fremont County School District No. 38, many have adopted the state's standard, the Common Core State Standards, an initiative adopted by 45 states (Oklahoma included) and three U.S. territories.

"When I came here 22 years ago," Stoll said, "there was no standard."

Math coach David Holbert is in his first year at Arapahoe Schools. When students struggle in class, he works with them during library time during the school day.

"With the interventions going on, we have had tremendous growth," he

Students are making improvement of half a grade level or better, and those gains carry over with students as they graduate from third to fourth and fifth grades and beyond.

"It is very evident that we're not having to dig as deep with kids as we have in the past," Holbert added. These improvements are good for the district, but they also impact students' self esteem, Sherman said.

U.S. Census data shows the city of Arapahoe had a population of 1,656 at the 2010 Census. It is estimated that more than half of the population 18 and under live below the poverty

Sherman said the district has a high instance of mobile and transient students moving because they live in foster homes or with grandparents and relatives. Sometimes, families move to look for work and return. There are many reasons.

"Anytime there's poverty, you're going to have an instance (of mobile students). You have alcoholism and everything involved with a high poverty area - a lot of the so-called social ills," Sherman added.

The school and its students have been looked down on by some people, Braack said, because of racial barriers and beliefs among some in the area that Native American students are not as intelligent as their non-Native peers. Freemont and other schools have had a bad reputation unfairly given to them.

"Arapaho culture has so much that is sacred and attention placed on teaching children respect, kindness and forgiveness," Braack said. "It's time to teach people to have pride in Araphoe. We want our children to be proud."

With further efforts to include more of the Arapaho language and culture into classrooms and inviting parents to become more involved with the schools, Arapahoe's schools are on the path to making that

At the beginning of the school year, the K-8 grade students enjoyed a day of ice cream, face painting, tugof-war and other fun and games to celebrate achievement on the 2011-12 PAWS Test. The event was an open house event that later hosted a powwow with activities open to everyone. The district celebrates achievement, Sherman said.

"My goal is that we be the top elementary school in the state in the future. I think that's very possible," she added. "Our staff is willing to go to any lengths to make sure our students get a quality education."

Earlier this year, Cherokee Nation citizen Ruth Fallon went to the dental clinic for a root canal and crown. After her root canal was completed, she was informed that there was a $200 charge for a crown – something she said she was not appraised of before her appointment.

"In order to charge a fee, there has to be a bilateral agreement," she said. "You can't just impose it after the fact."

In response, Fallon wrote letters to officials with Indian Health Services and launched the Native Citizens Health Care Alliance. The organization is hosting a march outside the Three Rivers Dental Clinic at 1001 S. 41st Street East in Muskogee, Okla., on Nov. 27 at 11 a.m.

"My family has a long history of service to the tribe," she said. "My great-great-grandfather was the first Cherokee Nation Supreme Court justice in both the east and west. This is the first time I've gone to the tribe for health care and I am not impressed."

Amanda Clinton, director of communications for Cherokee Nation, said that according to IHS policy, root canals and crowns are considered two separate procedures for billing and insurance coverage. Normally, the tribe's clinics won't offer a procedure unless it can cover the cost for patients who do not have Medicaid, Medicare or private insurance. However, crowns are an exception.

"Three Rivers started a pilot program less than a year ago in which they make their own crowns," she said. "They (crowns) are optional, but are suggested for root canal patients.

"They (the Three Rivers Dental Clinic) had never done crowns before this program. The $200 fee is to cover the costs of the materials used for making the crowns because they're pretty expensive to make."

In late 2011, the Cherokee Nation enacted legislation to allocate an additional 5 percent of casino profits to contract health services, which covers specialty medical needs that might not necessarily be available at IHS facilities. However, those additional funds are listed in the tribe's 2013 budget as specifically for dentures and eyeglasses. Clinton confirmed that the additional 5 percent does not cover crown costs at Three Rivers and said the tribe is looking for a way to cover those expenses for citizens who do not have Medicaid or Medicare.

In the meantime, Fallon is preparing to make her case known outside the dental clinic and has been reaching out to other groups whose members use Three Rivers Dental Clinic, including the Descendants of Freedmen Association.

"Someone needed to speak up about this," she said. "The Creator might just have picked me."

NCAIED hosts first regional conference in Catoosa

■ In addition to the two days of shows, panels and speakers, the organization presented its national awards during RES Oklahoma, including college scholarships, the Jay Silverheels award, the First American Entrepreneurship awards, the First American Corporate Leadership award and recognition of the center's 2012 "40 Under 40" list.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON
Native American Times

CATOOSA, Okla. – The National Center for American Indian Enterprise Development hosted its first regional Reservation Economic Summit Nov. 14-15, choosing Oklahoma for its inaugural event.

Since 1980, the organization has hosted an annual national RES event in Las Vegas, featuring speakers, panels, a trade fair and networking opportunities for Native American entrepreneurs, tribal economic and business development decision-makers, tribal leaders, government and corporate executives and buyers seeking Native American suppliers and contractors.

"At our last RES event, more than $1 billion in contracts were signed in one day," said Margo

Gray-Proctor, chairwoman of NCAIED's board of directors. "That kind of impact is power. It also means opportunity and a chance to combat our social ills."

A piece of that action came to the Hard Rock Casino and Hotel, with two days of panels and networking opportunities for attendees from across the country.

"We've had a turnout that has exceeded our expectations," NCAIED Chief Executive Officer and President Gary Davis said. "It has been phenomenal to see folks come together to our first regional summit. It has been humbling.

"Altogether, the total number of attendees somewhere around 400. We would have been completely happy with 250 and set our projections at that number. To have it exceed it by that much, we just wanted to make sure we had the content and we had the type of event where people literally had an incredible takeaway."

Among the speakers during the two-day event were Lance Morgan, the president and CEO of Ho-Chunk, Inc., former Osage Nation chief Jim Gray and David Hinson, the national director of the United States Minority Business Development Agency. The event also featured a trade show with more than 60 Native-owned businesses and an art market.

In addition to the two days of shows, panels and speakers, the organization presented its national awards during RES Oklahoma, including college scholarships, the Jay Silverheels award, the First American Entrepreneurship awards, the First American Corporate Leadership award and recognition of the center's 2012 "40 Under 40" list. More than one-fourth of the 2012 "40 Under 40" recipients either live in Oklahoma or are originally from the state.

A second regional RES event is in the planning stages for summer 2013. Although a return trip to Oklahoma is not on the calendar just yet, Davis would not rule out a second RES Oklahoma, in part because of the number of tribally-owned and tribally-operated facilities that could host the event, compared to the number in the Las Vegas area. Due to RES Vegas' growth, only two properties in Las Vegas are now big enough to accommodate attendees and all of the event's sessions at one location. If NCAIED were to move it to a tribally-owned property in the area, the trade show, breakout sessions and other professional events would have to be at a separate convention center, which could create some lodging inconveniences for attendees.

"You can not argue the fact that the state of Oklahoma has an incredible population of Native people and we've had a tremendous support," he said. "Having said that, we have an equal amount of support nationally in attendance from a registrant...and exhibitor point of view.

"We would love to come back in Oklahoma. The facilities at Hard Rock have been very accommodating, but I know there are other tribal facilities in the state of Oklahoma. It would be something we would need to move around and be at other properties."

think that it is just a restaurant and smokeshop because that's all that is there now, but it's much more than that to us," Haozous said. "It is the first step in the repatriation of our tribe to its rightful home."

A lot of thought went into what to put on the sign, officials said. Adding on "Chiricahua Warm Springs Apache," reflects a shift in their identity from Fort Sill Apache back to their original name. The 697-member tribe is the successor to the Chiricahua Warm Springs Apache bands, who were removed to Oklahoma after Geronimo's capture in the 1880s.

An unconditional claim to their former reservation area has been elusive for the Apache band. After buying the land, a Fort Sill Apache smokeshop/restaurant was shifted into a Class II casino that was shut down in 2009 by then New Mexico governor, Bill Richardson, who said the land was not eligible for gaming. The tribe is seeking a two-part determination on the matter from the U.S. Department of Interior, officials said.

Their reservation anniversary ceremony also unveiled a new flag without the words Fort Sill and with the words, Chiricahua/Warm Springs. An official tribal name change is also in the works.

The steps they are taking to regain their place in their original territory don't mean every tribal member is all in for going west (their smokeshop/restaurant is named Apache Homelands). Tribal business committee member, Loretta Buckner, said she sees the tribe's affiliation with New Mexico as historical but has divided loyalties.

"When we were set free in all those years ago, some of us chose to stay," she said. "Oklahoma is home. I was born here. My mother was born in 1913. She was the last allottee and the youngest prisoner of war."

Over the course of a century (the Apache band celebrates the centennial of their release in 2013) the tribe arrived by train in Fort Sill from St. Augustine, Florida to be prisoners of war and later received land allotments in the early 1900s. They eventually established a land claim that paved the way for them to open a small but profitable gaming site in Lawton,

After opening a hotel at their Lawton casino in August, the tribe has turned its full attention and efforts toward New Mexico. They continue lobbying support for a Deming casino among various New Mexico politicians, a mix of pro and anti Fort Sill Apache/ Chiricahua Warm Springs interests.

New Mexico's governor, Susana Martinez continues to oppose the Apaches casino plans although the tribe hopes to find a booster for their cause in newly elected New Mexico Sen. Martin Heinrich, who replaced Sen. Jeff Bingaman, a staunch opponent to their plans. Sen. Heinrich was unavailable for comment, according to his representative, Whitney Potter.

Local Luna County Manager Kelly Kuentsler, said while she can't advocate for other entities, they regard the Fort Sill Apaches favorably.

"Luna County supports economic development in the Akela area," she said.

For them to return a measure would have to be OK'd by the tribe's general counsel (voting tribal members) before it could be realized. In the meantime, the tribe is doing what it can to reacquaint itself with their former territory while pushing for a way to make it happen.

"The problem with returning to the land is that we have no way to finance it," Haozous said. "That's why we are seeking to open a casino here, to provide opportunities for our members to move to the homeland with a job..."

compassion or bravery. Some modern-day Native American leaders have received war bonnets in ceremonies accompanied by prayers and songs.

"When you see a Lakota chief wearing a full headdress, you know that he was a very honorable man. He was a leader. He did a lot of honorable things for his people," said Michelle Spotted Elk, a Santa Cruz, California, woman of mixed heritage whose husband is Lakota. "It also has religious significance. With them, there's not a division between spirituality and their leadership."

Victoria's Secret model Karlie Kloss walked onto the runway last week wearing the floor-length feathered headdress, leopard-print underwear and high heels. She also was adorned with fringes and turquoise jewelry during a segment meant to represent the 12 months of the year – fireworks in July, rain gear for April and a headdress for November.

Kloss herself posted on Twitter that she was "deeply sorry if what I wore during the VS Show offended anyone."

Thousands of people have commented about the outfit on the company's Facebook page. Some praised Kloss' attire as artistic and urged those offended by it to "get over it." Several expressed appreciation to Victoria's Secret for halting its marketing approach for the clothing, and others reached back in history to explain their feelings.

"We have gone through the atrocities to survive and ensure our way of life continues," Navajo Nation spokesman Erny Zah said in an interview Monday. "Any mockery, whether it's Halloween, Victoria's Secret – they are spitting on us. They are spitting on our culture, and it's upsetting."

The Victoria's Secret stir follows a string of similar incidents. Paul Frank Industries Inc. and the band No Doubt ran into criticism earlier this year for their use of headdresses in clothing and parties, and in a cowboys-and-Indians-themed video, respectively. They offered apologies as well.

Last year, Urban Outfitters Inc. set off a firestorm of criticism with its line of Navajobranded clothing and accessories – particularly underwear and a liquor flask, which the tribe said was "derogatory and scandalous."

Abaki Beck was among a handful of Native American students who hosted a discussion last week at a private liberal arts college in St. Paul, Minnesota, on Native American culture in fashion and sports. She said companies first must learn from the mistake of ignoring Native American history and then make an effort to engage with Indian Country.

She wanted more than a short apology from Victoria's Secret instead of what she said sounded like an automated response.

"But perhaps that is an unrealistic hope," said the 19-year-old member of the Blackfeet Nation of Montana. "It is all about business, after all."

Jennie Luna, who is Chicana and Caxcan, said society largely is ignorant toward indigenous spirituality and doesn't understand what should not be marketed commercially. She and others say more education about Native American cultures is needed.

"We are people; we're not a fashion statement," Luna said. "We are people who are facing serious issues, and for them to further perpetuate the type of stereotypes and disregard for a community's way of life is unacceptable."

ReGina Zuni's advice to companies looking to market Native American culture is to hire Native Americans who have knowledge of tribal traditions, cultures and customs.

However, her reaction to hearing about the Victoria's Secret headdress wasn't outrage about the clothing itself, but about the lack of attention on health care, education, housing and other issues in Indian Country.

"To each his own," said Zuni, of Isleta Pueblo in New Mexico. "But seriously, if people want to grab media attention on Indian issues, this is not the issue to advance and place in the spotlight."

COMMENTARY

Open Carry a fact for Oklahoma, but not Indian Country

S.E. RUCKMAN

At midnight of the first day of the eleventh month, a different day dawned in Oklahoma. A new law went into effect that will undoubtedly change a few things around here. The "Open Carry" statute allows gun holders (who are trained and licensed) to publicly carry their guns. Make no mistake it signals a return to a time when this kind of gun-toting dress was de rigueur.

Advocates of this law cite that openly carrying (and swaggering) with the weight of one's gun is the hip and trendy thing to do among states. One news source cites that 14 other states have similar laws (all located in the west and even Connecticut). At the same time, Oklahoma's gubernatorial office puts it at 22 states with like statutes. This must be a reminder that if all of our friends are willing to jump off a cliff, we here in Oklahoma will start looking for a suitable launching point.

The law brings me no comfort. I have travelled to some of the states where similar Open Carry season exists and I don't recall seeing a firearm brandished yet. As the brainchild of Oklahoma state senator Anthony Sykes (a Republican attorney from Newcastle), the successful Senate Bill 1733 prevailed with the assertion that responsible gun-owning behavior in Oklahoma thrives. Incredibly, the sight of a gun brandished by qualified gun toters may even be a deterrent to the irresponsible ones.

Somewhere in all this is bound to be room for contradiction. Let's talk tribal here. Like a tree falling in the forest, does it makes a sound if no one is there to hear it? Likewise, does a state law have substance in Indian Country where it has no legal heft? The answer here is even murkier when it is a non-Indian on federally sanctioned tribal lands carrying said firearms that he might use against an

One tribal law enforcement officer said that they have been told that the new law cannot apply blindly in Oklahoma mainly due to jurisdictional complications. Despite a long ago era where our warriors were elegant Open Carriers, the issues at stake here move us past ordering a cool gun holster so we can imitate our forefathers.

Open any door to an Oklahoma tribal casino and look for sign. I mean the one marked by a tiny gun with a line drawn through it, a symbolism that one can interpret as a ban against all guns. Gun enthusiasts will have to suppress themselves or seek their gambling fix elsewhere.

In a place with 38 federally recognized tribes, crisscrossing jurisdictions is a legal reality and not an imaginary state (no pun intended). Open Carry is an issue that tribes will likely have to address individually since each tribal jurisdiction is a separate territory in the eyes of the federal government. And make no mistake, tribes guard their sovereignty.

Absurdly, the law also restricts gun carrying on property where privately ownedbusinesseshavedeemed it unfit. This also lends to the argument that Oklahoma's new open carry law borders on being superfluous, kind of like putting a tail on a snake. But if a gun owner wants to brandish their gun, the choice now exists.

The irony of this situation must be pointed out here. Over a century after Oklahoma came into being in 1907, the mindset has evolved to resurrect a questionable mentality that was once accepted without question. Indeed, urbane citizens in Oklahoma wonder what kind of message the new law sends to the rest of the country. I offer outsiders will view Oklahoma as a throwback to the Wild West. Only in these parts, it's the law.

In November the legal reality of Oklahoma's Open Carry became a fact. But one clear point is that the newly liberated gun carriers will not be able to carry their weapons in Indian Country, unless each tribe allows it in their respective jurisdiction.

Sweating a little blood in Indian Country

Notes from Indian Country

TIM GIAGO (Nanwica Kciji) © 2012 Unity South Dakota

A famous columnist once wrote, "It is easy to write a weekly column. All you have to do is sit in front of your typewriter until you sweat blood."

Of course the typewriter has long since been replaced by the computer, but that concept of writing a weekly column still holds true.

I bring this up for a variety of reasons. First off, this year will mark my 34th year of writing a weekly column. In those 34 years I have written somewhere in the neighborhood of 1, 768 columns. Some were good enough to win prestigious awards, some were mediocre, and others just plain awful, but over the years I persisted.

There are sources one can go to in researching facts and figures for a column, but at other times, especially when writing about the distant past, one has to rely entirely upon a good memory. I don't know if it is just a cliché or a medical fact, but one does lose a certain amount of recall when reaching a certain age.

When one writes a weekly column for as long as I have, it should go without saying that there will be critics of all stripes. But it is a realism that comes with the territory.

One critic took exception to an article I wrote about the massacre at Wounded Knee because I wrote that my grandmother, Sophie, was a student at Holy Rosary Mission, about 15 miles from Wounded Knee, when the massacre occurred. The critic called me, and in a backhanded way, my grandmother, liars. I have a copy of a year book published by the priests at Holy Rosary Mission that points out the irrefutable fact that my grandmother was on the grounds of the mission school on December 29, 1890, the day of the massacre. I also have my grandmother's word.

As the years have passed I find that this particular critic takes exception to everything I write and speaking to other columnists I find that many of them have one critic in particular who never ceases to criticize them at every turn.

If one writes anything that is open for public scrutiny one can expect feedback, sometimes good sometimes horrible. I always taught the reporters that worked for me at my weekly newspaper not to be afraid of criticism and not to censor letters to the editor that were critical of the newspaper, the reporters or the management.

There were letters that came into my newspaper calling me an SOB and worse. Without hesitation they were published, but there were times we had to clean up the language a bit in order not to offend our readers. Sadly this is not true of many of the Indian owned newspapers and magazines published today. Indian Country Today magazine, which was a newspaper when I sold it to the Oneida Nation of New York State, will not print letters to the editor.

consensus newspapers and magazines owned by tribal governments seems to be that tribal governments are criticism. Some of the criticisms they receive would be valid and others just so much political palaver, but it shouldn't matter because every member of the tribe should have the freedom to criticize. The Oneida Nation and several other tribal governments do not believe this is so. Freedom of the press and of expression is not always available in Indian country.

As long as I continue to write my weekly column I know that there will be those I will offend, there will be those that will nit-pick each word and paragraph, and there will be those with legitimate complaints of errors I may have committed. And there will be those who would criticize every column I write.

Criticism can hurt and threats oftentimes come with the criticism and since I am only human, there will be times when I will err and the criticism is well deserved. There are also racists out there that tear into anything I write and, I am proud to say, there are those who truly appreciate the things I write about and some have even gone so far as to say some of the things I have written over the years has affected and even changed their very lives.

Over these 34 years of writing I have spoken to Native Americans that pursued careers in journalism, movie directing, publishing their own newspapers, and become professors of journalism or write books because of something I wrote that inspired them.

In the long run, this should be the real test of any writer. To bring about change simply through the written word has proven to me that the pen is mightier than the sword. So after 34 years I can say thank you to my fans as well as to my critics. Both have made me a better writer and a better person. And every week, I'm still sweating a little blood.

AAIP offering antiobesity campaign toolkit, materials

AAIP News Release

OKLAHOMA CITY - The Association of American Indian Physicians (AAIP) has recently employed a new media campaign aimed to raise awareness of the obesity epidemic in Indian Country.

According to the Center for Disease Control, obesity rates in America have tripled in the past 30 years and one in every three children in the United States is obese. Those numbers are even more astronomical for the American Indian and Alaska Natives (AI/AN) – where citizens are 1.6 times as likely to be obese than Non-Hispanic whites. A separate national study of 4-year-olds shows that tribal youth are twice as likely to be obese as their peers.

"To help bring awareness to these troubling numbers, AAIP created a media campaign that we hope will be both informative and humorous. We wanted to tap into the generation using and sharing social media," said AAIP Executive Director Margaret Knight. "There are changes we can make to prevent the chronic diseases and mortality rates associated with obesity. And we are hoping this message is fun but also accessible and reaches tribal citizens on the media outlets they use daily."

Oklahoma-based Buffalo Nickel Creative created the videos and accompanying posters for AAIP.

AAIP Program Director Noelle Kleszynski said the look is fun but the message is serious for Native families. She said the campaign offers some ideas about creating better access for healthy eating and exercise

"Creating real changes that are systemic, environmental, and policy driven will improve and extend the lives of treasured elders and growing children," Kleszynski. "We must address the obesity issue head-on and replicate successful programs that build environments conducive to physical activity and increase access to nutritious food."

Kleszynski said grassroots solutions are possible with an inspired community.

"We hope the media campaign is something people will share and create a domino effect with its message that we can develop and offer healthier food choices for families at the local level, that we can build physical activity into everyday life and that we can work with tribal leaders to generate policies that promote these ideas," Kleszynski said.

Learning to love bison as the other red meat

J.M. HIRSCH
AP Food Editor

Nothing says "Yum!" like a bit of nomenclatural confusion... Especially with a side of near extinction.

But that's what you get once you venture down the culinary path with bison, an alternative red meat that is showing up at more and more grocers nationwide. And these massive shaggy creatures are such a delicious – and good for us – meat, it's worth sorting it all

So let's start with the name. The critter you know as the American buffalo (yes, of rolling plains and Native American fame) really isn't a buffalo at all. Turns out there are only a few types of buffalo in the world (including the Asian water buffalo and African Cape buffalo). The American buffalo (technically a bison) is more closely related to your run-of-the-mill cow.

Still, people tend to use the terms interchangeably and we're not going to get too bent out of shape over it.

Once, bison were hunted to near extinction. But they've made a pretty good turnaround and these days are raised primarily for consumption. Why do you care? Because bison meat (which is raised without hormones or antibiotics) can be incredibly tender and flavorful, with a sweet, rich beefy flavor.

It also happens to be amazingly lean, packing fewer calories and less fat than beef and even skinless chicken.

That low-fat profile comes with a price, however. Like any lean meat, bison has a tendency to cook quickly, so quickly that it's easy to overcook it. And that is why bison has a reputation for being tough. It isn't. If you have bison that is tough, that just means it was overcooked.

Though bison is available in most of the same cuts as traditional beef, the most common varieties at grocers are ground and steaks. We'll stick with those.

You can use bison much as you would beef. The trick is to modify the cooking method (rather than the flavors or other ingredients) to account for the leanness.

When cooking ground bison, it's best to work in some sort of liquid flavor to keep the meat moist. This might mean eggs or tomato paste for a meatloaf, or some sort of pan sauce or gravy if you are browning it in a skillet. That also makes it ideal for meatballs simmered in sauce or for using in chili.

For bison steaks, think fast and furious. Season them, then pop them under the broiler or on the grill for just a few minutes per side.

SEARED BISON WITH SAGE AND GNOCCHI

Start to finish: 15 minutes | Servings: 6

- 1 pound package gnocchi pasta
- 2 tablespoons olive oil
- 2 cloves garlic, minced

Direction of the second of the second

Pinch red pepper flakes

1 1/2 pounds bison steak, thinly sliced across the grain

1/4 cup chopped fresh sage 1/2 cup grated Parmesan cheese Salt and ground black pepper

Bring a large saucepan of salted water to a boil. Add the gnocchi and cook according to package directions. Reserve 1/4 cup of the cooking water, then drain the gnocchi and set aside.

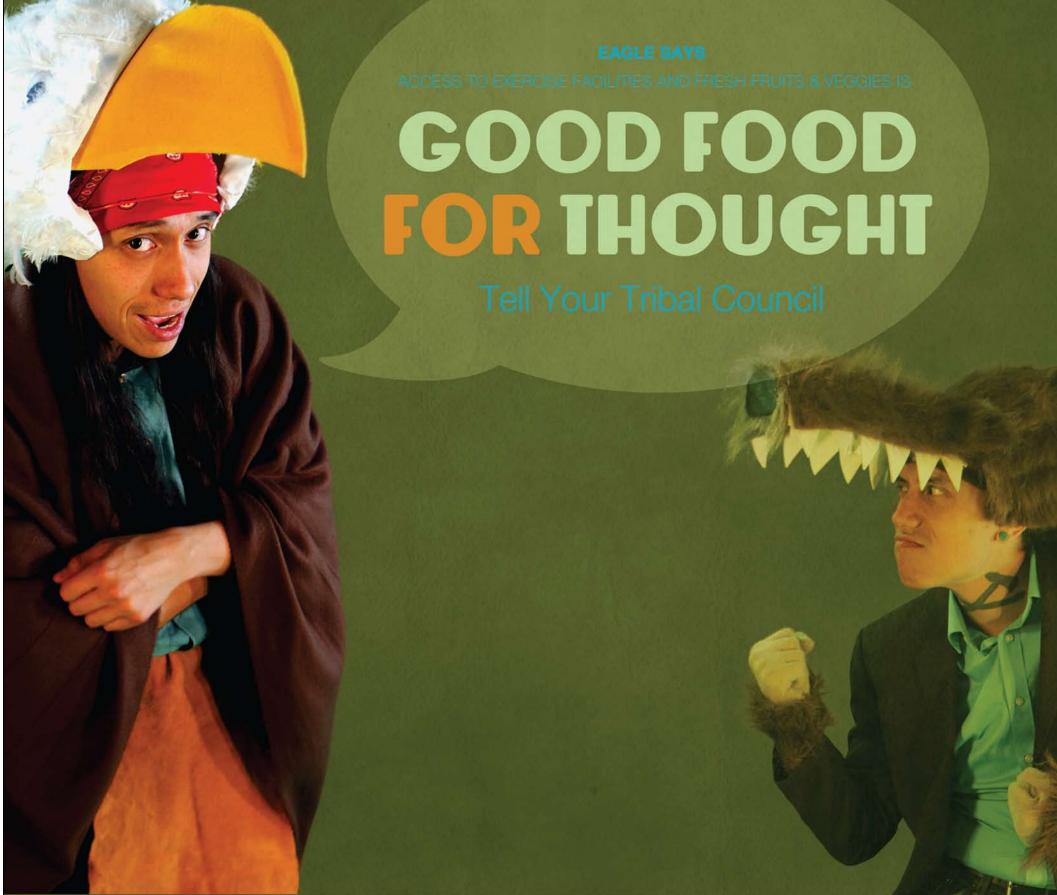

In a large skillet over medium-high, heat the oil. Add the garlic and red pepper flakes, then saute the garlic for 30 seconds.

Add the steak and sear on each side for about 1 minute. Don't crowd the pan or the steak with steam rather than sear. If needed, work in batches.

Once the steak is seared, add the sage and cooked gnocchi. Cook for 30 seconds, then add the Parmesan. Drizzle in just enough of the reserved cooking water to form a sauce with the melted cheese. Toss, then season with salt and pepper.

Okla. legislator raising stink over Muscogee (Creek) naming rights deal

Rep. Don Armes, R-Faxon

■ Don Armes, R-Faxon, calls the tribe's investment "an obvious effort to circumvent terms of a compact."

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

OKLAHOMA CITY - An Oklahoma legislator has requested an investigation into a tribe's recent transaction with Tulsa County officials.

Rep. Don Armes (R-Faxon) announced Nov. 19 that he asked Gov. Mary Fallin and Oklahoma Attorney General Scott Pruitt to look into the proceedings surrounding the Muscogee (Creek) Nation's acquisition of the naming rights to the Expo Square at the Tulsa County Fairgrounds, citing concerns over the Tulsa County Public Facilities Authority's transparency and the potential economic impact the deal's stipulations may have.

Earlier this month, officials with the Muscogee (Creek) Nation announced the $1.44 million purchase, which will remain in effect at least through 2019. The agreement, which was approved unanimously without comment by the Tulsa County Public Facilities Authority, included a provision that would end live horse racing at Fair Meadows, a track located on the eastern edge of the fairgrounds, thus cutting out millions of dollars in gaming compact funds that were used to supplement race purses at tracks across Oklahoma.

"This is about greed and the willful and blatant disregard of the rule of law and should not be allowed to stand," Armes said. "This job-killing, industry-terminating deal does not pass the smell test.

"What appears to be an obvious effort to circumvent terms of a compact needs to be exposed before

Tribe seeks to turn corner in its history

MATTHEW BROWN

BILLIINGS, Mont. (AP) – Montana's Little Shell tribe appeared poised to fade from history in recent years after it was denied federal government recognition, lost its financial support from the state and saw its elected leadership splinter.

But the past year has brought a sharp turnaround for the 4,500-member landless tribe that long has existed on society's fringe.

Tribal enrollment is on the rise. Government grant money is flowing again. A Little Shell cultural and visitor center opened this month in Great Falls. And a new council, sworn in Sunday, is considering launching future business enterprises to make the tribe self-sufficient – even as the battle for government recognition grinds on.

"We're starting to operate as a tribe once again," said Gerald Gray, incoming chairman for the Little Shell Chippewa Tribe.

Hard times and misfortune are familiar to the Little Shell, who struggled to stay together through more than a century of poverty and dislocation.

Gray and others from the tribe said they are determined to shape a more hopeful future. That includes using the cultural center to strengthen their shared heritage and creating employment opportunities through business ventures and the tribal office.

Judge declines access to frozen C&A funds

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON
Native American Times

ARAPAHO, Okla. – A Custer County District Court judge denied an application last week to access frozen Cheyenne and Arapaho tribal funds.

Citing an appeal pending before the Oklahoma Supreme Court, judge Doug Haught declined to allow three tribal programs access to frozen contract funds.

"I don't know how long it will be until the (Oklahoma) Supreme Court rules, but I will not grant any requests until then," Haught said during Monday morning's hearing. "When and if they take action, then that will obviously change."

The appeal comes on a previous decision by Haught to place the tribes' bank accounts under the supervision of the Custer County District Court due to an ongoing leadership dispute between Janice Prairie Chief-Boswell and Leslie Wandrie-Harjo. Officials from either government attempting to withdraw funds must contact the court and the other government in writing before any removals are allowed. Prairie Chief-Boswell's administration has filed the Supreme Court appeal and maintains that the district court does not have the jurisdiction to hear the bank's suit since it involves as sovereign nation.

Using figures from the tribes' 2008 budget, Thomas Ivester, a Sayre, Okla.-based attorney representing the Wandrie-Harjo recognized legislature, filed the request last month to access federal contract funds for the tribes' elder nutrition program, emergency youth shelter and Indian Child Welfare office using figures from the tribes' 2008 budget.

"These three programs were chosen in part because we thought they would be universally accepted," he said. "The 2008 budget was chosen because that was the last universally accepted budget.

"These are all programs funded by federal contracts and are monitored by the BIA."

Had the application been allowed, Ivester also asked that the Western Oklahoma regional office of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in Anadarko, Okla., be notified so the office can closely monitor the drawdowns.

Although Haught acknowledged that he opened the door for the legislature's appeal through comments in a previous hearing, he also declined to take action on whether the legislature from either administration has the legal standing to request access to the funds. In the lawsuit, filed by the Clinton, Okla.-based First Bank and Trust, the Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes, Wandrie-Harjo and Prairie Chief-Boswell are all named as defendants, but neither legislature is specifically

"I know we need to set a hearing to determine whether either legislature has legal standing," Haught said. "However, I won't just yet until the Supreme Court gets a look at this case"

Excluding the workers at their five western Oklahoma casinos, the Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes employ about 500 people. More than 12,000 people are enrolled in the constitutionally-bound tribes, including about 5,000 who live within the tribes' nine-county jurisdictional

More celebs help tribes' push for sacred land

P Diddy and Bette Midler are the latest big names to throw their support behind a fundraising effort to buy nearly 2,000 acres (800 hectares) of pristine prairie grass in the Black Hills of South Dakota.

SIOUX FALLS, South Dakota (AP) – More celebrities are backing an online campaign to raise money so that Native American tribes in South Dakota can purchase land they consider sacred.

P Diddy and Bette Midler are the latest big names to throw their support behind a fundraising effort to buy nearly 2,000 acres (800 hectares) of pristine prairie grass in the Black Hills of South Dakota.

Three days after the campaign began, P Diddy tweeted: "Help save the Sioux Nation! Click here," and linked to the website. Midler also lent her voice, tweeting: "Incredible story re the Sioux Sacred Grounds. Donate what you can."

More than $18,000 had been raised as of Sunday afternoon – $6,000 flowed in immediately after P Diddy's tweet. The campaign will last through Nov. 30, when the tribes of the Great Sioux Nation must have $9 million in order to purchase the land.

The tribes have raised $7 million so far for the 1,942 acres (786 hectares), which they call Pe' Sla (pay shlaw), or "old baldy." There are Sioux tribes in the Dakotas, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska and Canada.

The property is important to their creation story, and tribal members have long held ceremonies there. When the land was put up for sale, tribal members worried it would be developed because of its proximity to Mount Rushmore.

Landowners Leonard and Margaret Reynolds canceled a public auction of the property earlier this year after tribal members expressed outrage. The Reynolds then accepted the tribes' bid to purchase the land for $9

Snag in church abuse lawsuit negotiations

MATT VOLZ Associated Press

HELENA, Mont. (AP) Settlement negotiations between hundreds of alleged sex abuse victims and the Roman Catholic Diocese of Helena may have hit a snag with the church's insurers refusing to cover the claims.

The insurers and the diocese are locked in a dispute over the terms and conditions of the diocese's insurance policies that date back to the 1970s - and whether some policies even existed. The sides disagree on how policies apply to the 324 claims of sex abuse stretching back decades by priests and nuns in homes, churches and school across western Montana.

The claims are from two combined lawsuits filed last year against the diocese and the Ursuline Sisters of the Western Province. The plaintiffs, many of them Native Americans, say the diocese and the sisters knew or should have known about the abuse, but covered it up instead of stopping it.

Attorneys for the alleged victims filed a legal complaint in state court on Nov. 14 asking for a declaratory judgment determining the scope and extent of the policies issued by the insurers.

Later that day, three of the diocese's insurers led by Travelers Casualty and Surety Co. filed a separate complaint in federal court asking for a ruling that they have no obligation to defend or indemnify the diocese.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs said Tuesday they object to the federal filing because the original lawsuit is in state court and that is the proper venue to decide state law.

"If the issues become an obstacle to settlement, then it's before a Montana court," attorney Gary Zadick said.

The negotiations with the diocese are still progressing, but the purpose behind the filing is to ensure there is enough money, including insurance money, available to compensate the plaintiffs, attorney Milt Datsopoulos said.

Travelers spokeswoman Jennifer Wislocki said she could not comment on pending litigation.

The alleged victims' complaint says the 13 named insurance companies all issued policies covering the diocese or the Ursulines, and the insurers are now obligated to defend them against the claims.

The complaint by three insurance companies led by Travelers says the insurers have no obligation to defend the diocese or pay out any claims. In a complex legal argument, the insurers claim the dioceses' insurance policies did not actually exist, or else were canceled or lost.

But if the policies actually exist, the insurers go on, they did not include liability coverage unless liability forms were included by mistake - a mistake the insurer did not discover until after the sex-abuse lawsuit was filed.

And even if a judge rules the policies included liability coverage, the insurers' argument concludes, the diocese breached its contract because it did not notify the insurers the abuse was happening.

As a result, evidence has been lost, and victims, witnesses and perpetrators have died, and the diocese forfeited any right to coverage as a result of its breach of policy, the insurers claim.

LOS ANGELES TIMES | COURTESY

Greg Haverstock, the Bureau of Land Management archeologist for the area, tells the LA Times this is "the worst act of vandalism ever seen" on the 750,000 acres of public land administered by the BLM field office in Bishop.

Ancient rock carvings stolen in Sierra Nevada

BISHOP, Calif. (AP) - Rock carvings that graced a sacred American Indian site in California's Sierra Nevada for thousands of years have fallen prey to modern thieves armed with power saws.

At least four petroglyphs - some 2 feet wide and located 15 feet above the ground - were hacked from lava cliffs in the Eastern Sierra, the Los Angeles Times reported Sunday.

Visitors to the area, known as Volcanic Tableland, discovered the theft and reported it to the federal Bureau of Land Management on Oct.

"This was the worst act of vandalism ever seen" on the 750,000 acres of public land administered by the BLM field office in Bishop, BLM archaeologist Greg Haverstock told the newspaper.

The thieves must have used ladders, electric generators and power saws. In addition to the four carvings that were stolen, one was defaced with deep saw cuts on three sides, and another was removed but apparently broke during the theft and was left propped against a boulder near a visitor parking lot. More than 3,500 years ago, Native Americans carved pictures of hunters, deer and other animals, and geometric and other designs into a half-mile-long volcanic escarpment. The images adorn hundreds of lava boulders.

The petroglyphs are probably worth only about $500 to $1,500 on the illegal art market but are priceless to American Indians, authorities

"We still use this sacred place as a kind of church to educate tribal members and children about our historical and spiritual connections," Paiute tribal historic preservation officer Raymond Andrews said. "So, our tribal elders are appalled by what happened here."

Volunteers have stepped up surveillance at the site, which is listed on the National Register of Historic Places. The BLM is offering a $1,000 reward for information leading to arrests. A first-time felony conviction for damaging or removing petroglyphs can carry a one-year prison sentence and a $20,000 fine.

Meanwhile, federal officials and American Indian leaders plan to mark the damage with signs noting that it was done by, as Haverstock put it, "malicious, selfish individuals."

Feds: S. Dakota lender uses reservation as shield

JONATHAN ELLIS Argus Leader

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) – With a population of 450, Timber Lake on the Cheyenne River Indian Reservation sits in one of the poorest and most remote counties in the country.

But government regulators across the country have their eye on the north-central South Dakota town. They say Timber Lake harbors a predatory businessman who has fleeced financially distressed consumers across the country with high-interest loans.

Martin "Butch" Webb, an enrolled member of the tribe, is defending his businesses from legal actions brought by the Federal Trade Commission and state authorities.

Webb owns at least nine Internet lending businesses, according to court records. Regulators accuse Webb and his businesses of illegal lending and collection practices, operating without a license in states and dodging state limits on interest rates.

Webb disputes the accusations leveled by regulators, arguing that conventional banks often charge high interest rates combined with overdraft fees and other charges. He argues he's just another player in the lending industry.

"I think we're serving a group of people that are underserved by conventional banking," he said. "Their demands aren't being met."

It's a complex financial web, complicated by questions of the authority of the federal government to enforce laws on an Indian reservation, where the concept of sovereignty clouds authority.

BACKED BY ELITE WASHINGTON FIRM

Webb has powerful allies on his side. He's represented against the FTC by a prestigious K-Street law firm in Washington, D.C., Katten Muchin Rosenman. Patrick Dorton, who arranged an interview with Webb, was a special assistant to President Bill Clinton and now is a partner in a Washington public relations firm.

Court records also outline a relationship between Webb's operation and CashCall, a short-term lender and mortgage business based in Anaheim, Calif. CashCall's president and CEO is J. Paul Reddam, a philosophy professor-turned-lender who gained fame this year when his horse, I'll Have Another, won the Kentucky Derby and the Preakness Stakes.

CashCall has faced its own legal problems. In West Virginia this year, a judge ordered CashCall to pay $13.7 million in penalties and cancel $2.3 million if they have the money by Nov.

The couple has repeatedly said they million in debts owed by West Virginia consumers, said Norman Googel, a senior assistant attorney general who prosecuted the case.

Regardless, the Internet is rife with consumer complaints about his companies. The Better Business Bureau gives Western Sky an F rating.

Payday lenders and high-interest installment companies have used different methods to evade state usury laws. One was to work with banks. Federal law allows a bank in one state to export its interest rates to borrowers in other states. Banks were acting as front companies for high-interest lenders, in essence "renting their charters," Googel said.

That was particularly true among some banks in South Dakota, where there are no usury rates. In CashCall's West Virginia case, CashCall was a partner with First Bank & Trust of Milbank.

USING TRIBES TO 'GET AROUND STATE LAWS'

Federal regulators have cracked down on that practice, and now the lending companies have turned to tribes, which have sovereign immunity.

"Thus far, what we have found is that tribes are playing a nominal role," Googel said. "The tribes are really being used by the real, outside lender to get around state laws."

Webb's situation adds a wrinkle to that. He's an enrolled member, but his businesses aren't affiliated with the tribe. But Webb argues that because his businesses are on the Cheyenne River reservation, they operate under the umbrella of sovereign immunity.

"We're operating within the boundaries of the reservation," he said. "Therefore, we're operating under tribal jurisdiction. The people come to us for the loans. We don't go to them."

Nathalie Martin, a professor at the University of New Mexico School of Law, has studied the issue of tribes and their relationships with payday lenders and other high-interest loan businesses. She does not think Webb is covered by sovereign immunity.

"I don't think this is a winning argument," she said.

"If the lender is literally set up as a tribal corporation and it's the tribe itself, that's what is entitled to sovereign immunity, not the person," Martin added.

Cheyenne River Tribal Chairman Kevin Keckler Sr. said Webb's lending operation is unrelated to the tribe.

Webb said his companies have sold loans to CashCall. During an interview Friday, Webb was at home recovering from an illness, and he said he didn't have access to records for how many loans had been sold to CashCall.

loans had been sold to CashCall.

A representative of CashCall did not return messages.

BUILT 'INCH BY INCH' STARTING IN 2009

Webb, 56, said he has a background in banking, and he started building his operation about 2009. It was a slow process because the remote region didn't have the Internet infrastructure in place, and the operation has been built "inch by inch."

He employs 100 people, he said. Another 70 positions will be created with expanded Internet capabilities. It's major employment for the Cheyenne River reservation, and he said some of his employees haven't had a family member with a full-time job in three or four generations.

In the industry of high-interest loans and high-interest credit cards, officials justify the rates and fees because their clientele have high default rates. The people who seek such loans or credit cards often have sketchy credit histories that bar them from seeking loans from conventional banks.

Webb said his companies' rates are high because so many people who borrow don't pay back their loans. Those who make payments also are paying for those who defaulted. And, he added, consumers are warned.

'CHEAPER THAN A PAYDAY ADVANCE'

In one television ad for Western Sky Financial, one of Webb's companies, a spokeswoman says: "Yes, the money's expensive, but it's a lot cheaper than a payday advance."

In another, the spokesman says: "Yes, the money's expensive, but there's no collateral required, and you can keep the cost down by paying it back as fast as you can."

"We're a very open, honest company," Webb said.

"He is a tribal member and operates his own business," Keckler said.

Webb employs tribal members in his operations, and jobs are good for any community, Keckler added. But the chairman wouldn't comment on the controversy surrounding the businesses.

"That's between him and the states," Keckler said.

STATES, FTC SUING OVER OPERATIONS

It's between Webb and a growing list of states. West Virginia and Maryland courts already have ruled that Webb doesn't enjoy the benefits of sovereign immunity. His companies are established under South Dakota law and they do not benefit the tribe, according to a judge who ruled in West Virginia.

Colorado also is suing Webb.

"That is going through the judicial process now," said Carolyn Tyler, spokeswoman for Colorado Attorney General John Suthers.

The Washington State Department of Financial Institutions took action last month against Webb.

"These companies are preying on financially struggling Washington consumers with loans at unconscionable repayment terms," said Deborah Bortner, director of consumer services, in announcing the action.

But the biggest threat to Webb's operation comes from the Federal Trade Commission lawsuit filed in federal court in South Dakota. If successful, that action could shut him down.

A spokeswoman for the FTC wouldn't comment on the case.

GARNISHING WAGES WITHOUT COURT ORDER

The FTC complaint alleges a host of violations. When borrowers got behind on their payments, Webb's companies would attempt to garnish wages without obtaining a court order, according to the complaint. Collectors working for Webb also disclosed the amounts that debtors owed to employers and co-workers, a violation of federal law.

Lawyers for Webb, meanwhile, have sought to dismiss one portion of the FTC complaint. Borrower loan applications include a notice that, in the event of default, collection actions against the borrower will be brought in the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribal Court. Webb's lawyers argue the Supreme Court has ruled that tribal courts can exercise jurisdiction in over contracts between Indians and non-Indians.

The FTC argues the loans are off-reservation activity because they are taken out by people who aren't on the reservation. Thus, tribal jurisdiction doesn't apply.

A decision on the motion is pending.

Meanwhile, Webb continues to move forward with his expansion plans. To him, he's offering an honest service while also benefiting his impoverished community. To regulators across the country, he's a villain.

And if the federal government succeeds in its legal challenge?

"You'd just have to re-evaluate and see if we'd appeal or shut down," Webb said.

Chase Iron Eyes, a member of the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe who started the online campaign and appeared in the video, said he wants the celebrity endorsements to help raise money, but more than anything, he hopes it will widen the network of people who are thinking about the land and what it means for the tribes.

Dartmouth partners with Indian Health Service

HANOVER, N.H. (AP) - Dartmouth College and Dartmouth-Hitchcock Medical Center have joined a partnership aimed at promoting the health of Native Americans across the country and developing leaders in the Native American community.

The college and medical center recently signed memorandum understanding with the Indian Health Service, which is part of the federal Department of Health and Human Services.

The partnership's goals include improving undergraduate understanding of Native American health care, recruiting and training health care professionals from the Native American community at Dartmouth and providing educational opportunities for doctors and nurses at the Indian Health Service.

Tribal members want rest of settlement money

PABLO, Mont. (AP) -Members of the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes want to vote on whether the tribe should distribute the rest of a $150 million federal settlement to its members or keep it for tribal programs.

A group called the People's Voice presented the council with a petition containing 1,414 signatures of enrolled tribal members asking for a referendum vote, representative Jeri Roullier of St. Ignatius told the Missoulian.

CSKT spokesman Rob McDonald said Monday the tribe's legal team is reviewing the petition.

"There are a number of questions that need to be answered before the council can decide how to respond appropriately," McDonald said.

The tribe received the money as part of the "Salazar settlement" in a lawsuit over federal mismanagement of assets and natural resources held in trust by the government for the tribes. The council voted to distribute just over half of the money to its members and keep the rest for various tribal programs.

In September, about 7,800 tribal members received $10,000 each. Petitioners want another $9,000 paid out to each tribal member.

"The reservation is going through the worst recession our generation has ever known," Roullier said.

LA buying $1.6B power from tribal solar plant

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The largest solar power plant on tribal lands in the United States is expected to go online in southern Nevada's desert in 2016 under a new 25-year, $1.6 billion deal approved by Los Angeles city council to buy solar power produced on the Moapa River Indian Reservation.

The 250-megawatt solar  $farm\,30\,miles\,northeast\,of\,Las$ Vegas will generate enough electricity for 118,000 homes more than 280 miles away in Los Angeles.

William Anderson, chairman of the Moapa Band of Paiutes, said some 910,000 photovoltaic panels will be built on 2,000 acres on the 71,680-acre reservation.

"I just can't believe that we're actually going to have something like this on the reservation," Anderson told the Las Vegas Review Journal on Tuesday after the council unanimously to purchase power from developer K Road Moapa Solar LLC in conjunction with the tribe.

"This is a perfect match," legal tribal administrator Yvette Chevalier said. "I think it's going to pave the way for further economic development."

The Interior Department approved the project in June under a broad effort to bring solar, wind and geothermal projects to public lands.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev.,

a chief opponent of coal plants, praised the publicprivate-tribal partnership as a "powerful example" of how clean energy can boost Nevada's economy.

"Unlike the old, dirty technologies used at the nearby Reid Gardner coal plant, this new solar project will not emit any hazardous emissions, wastes, or carbon pollution," he said.

Under California's renewable energy law, the Department of Water and Power must generate 25 percent of its power from solar, wind and other renewable energy sources by 2016, and 33 percent by 2020. The commission's leader, Jim Zorn, has insisted that night deer hunting would be safe. The authorization's terms largely parallel the state's night wolf hunting regulations. Tribal hunters would be allowed to shine deer only at the point of kill - not randomly sweep fields and woods with lights – just like wolf hunters.

Tribal hunters also would have to submit a shooting plan noting they have visited the hunting area during the day, clearly marking a safe field of fire and noting schools, roads and other structures within a quarter-

Under the terms of the compact, each tribe that has a casino within 20 miles of a live horse racing facility has to contribute to the purse fund in exchange for track owners not installing electronic gaming machines. In addition to Fair Meadows, live horse racing was conducted at Oklahoma City's Remington Downs and Claremore's Will Rogers Downs during the 2012 season. Will Rogers Downs is owned by Cherokee Nation Entertainment.

Over the last seven years, Fair Meadows has lost at least $695,000 per year thanks in part to dwindling attendance.

"This was a business decision by the (fair board), and while we know there will be some impact to the horse industry, it is not in the best interest of Tulsa County citizens to continue live racing at Fair Meadows," Tulsa County Commissioner and Tulsa County Public Facilities Authority Chairman Fred Perry said.

In addition to requesting an investigation, the Comanche County Republican has asked the governor's office to direct the Oklahoma Department of Commerce to review the situation and give a tentative timeline as to how quickly the state legislature could reverse or minimize any negative economic impact from ending live racing at the Tulsa track.

"Gov. Fallin has been contacted multiple by stakeholders concerned about the future of Fair Meadows racetrack," Fallin spokesman Alex Weintz wrote in an e-mail. "She has asked her staff to look into the events surrounding its closing to ensure that proper measures were taken to ensure transparency."

Requests for comment from Pruitt and Muscogee (Creek) Nation officials were not returned.

the commission of overstepping its "People will not be safe if tribal members are allowed to discharge high-powered firearms at night in the ceded territory," Assistant Attorney General Diane Milligan, who is representing the DNR, wrote in the court motion.

The commission's move marks another dicey chapter in the state's relationship with the six Chippewa tribes in Wisconsin.

Under treaties signed in the early 1800s, the Chippewa ceded the 22,400 square miles across northern Wisconsin to the government.

A federal court ruling in 1991 found the tribes have the right to harvest at least 50 percent of the quota for any animal hunted in the territory. Backed by that court ruling, the tribes have run their own deer hunt in the ceded territory for years independent of the state's bow and firearm seasons for years. The tribal season generally runs from late August until early January.

The tribes tried to draft rules allowing their members to hunt deer at night more than two decades ago. They argued then that they should be allowed to hunt at night because the state permitted night coyote and fox hunting.

A federal judge ultimately forbid it, ruling that hunting deer at night is more dangerous than hunting fox and coyotes because hunters use larger bullets fired from longer ranges at higher angles.

The wolf hunt, though, has stirred up plenty of resentment among the Chippewa, who consider the animal a brother.

State legislators concerned that the burgeoning wolf population was causing more livestock attacks approved a plan this spring establishing the first organized wolf hunt, despite fierce tribal opposition. The commission even went so far as to lay claim to the lives of every wolf in the ceded territory in an effort to protect them.

In September, the commission angered the DNR by unilaterally allowing tribal hunters to kill an elk, a species the DNR has been trying to reestablish in Wisconsin for decades.

TRIBE

Seventy-five new members have enrolled with the tribe in the past year, Gray said. Meanwhile, more $190,000 in grants and other assistance came in to help pay for the visitor center, establish a wellness program and revive the tribe's anti-tobacco

There's still much work to be done,includingre-establishing the tribe's nonprofit status, cleaning up its enrollment records and trying to ensure the financial problems that crippled the tribe in recent years don't recur.

But Bonnie Stevens, a registered member of the tribe from Helena, said the tribe's ability to overcome its recent turmoil serves as a testament to its cohesion.

"We may fight, but in our own hearts and mind, we're a tribe," she said. "If we weren't a tribe, we'd just go our separate ways and scatter forever."

The tribe traces its ancestry to the Pembina Band of Chippewa Indians, who in the 1800s were under the leadership of Chief Little Shell when they were offered an unfair land deal that resulted in the band leaving North Dakota.

Government pledges to establish a reservation for the tribe in Montana never came through, and the Little Shell are now spread across the Northern Plains and central Canada. Many also call themselves Metis, a Canadian people with mixed European and Native American roots.

The tribe is recognized by the state of Montana. But its drive for federal acknowledgement by the Department of Interior, which dates at least to the 1970s, hit a major roadblock in 2009 when federal officials rejected the bid. The agency cited in part the tribe's "departures from precedent" a reference to the Little Shell's far-flung membership and its history of intermarriage with non-Indians and members of other tribes.

Also during that period, the tribe's finances started to unravel when accounting problems surfaced under former chairman John Sinclair. The state of Montana suspended grants for a tobacco prevention program, and economic development funds were put on hold. That translated into an $867,000 financial hit for the Little Political turmoil ensued, and dueling elections were held that resulted in two groups claiming to be the tribe's rightful leader - one under Sinclair's control and another under the leadership of Great Falls businessman John Gilbert.

Gilbert's side prevailed when the matter was finally settled last December by a three-judge panel of tribal law experts. Sinclair, who could not be reached for comment for this story, said at the time he was unlikely to run again.

The elections earlier this month were the first since the political dispute was settled. Former state Sen. Joe Troplia, who helped oversee the process, said that with the election the tribe appears to have finally quelled its internal rivalries.

Incoming chairman Gray, a vice president at a Billings advertising agency and vice chairman under Gilbert, said the strife during Sinclair's tenure revealed weaknesses within the tribe that need to be fixed. That included a flawed constitution and few financial controls.

Gray said the tribe will be renewing its drive for federal recognition, which could bring housing and education assistance and other help in addition to land for a reservation.

Montana U.S. Sen. Jon Tester has introduced legislation to force the government to recognize the tribe. The Democrat's bill will have to be reintroduced next year if it's not acted on in the next few weeks.

Nicholas Vrooman, Helena-based historian who wrote a book about the Little Shell that soon will be released, traces the tribe's modernday problems to a century of federal negligence.

Without a home to call their own or resources to maintain a functioning government, Vrooman said, the tribe has long been defined by outsiders by the strife and difficulties it has faced.

But Vrooman said those problems also have helped the Little Shell reach a new level of self-understanding including the realization they cannot wait for government help if they want to survive and move forward in the

"They don't need the federal government to sanction them now - to say they're legitimate. They know who they are now," he said. "The struggle for their community is the proof of their community."

Playing both sides against the middle

Notes from Indian

Country

TIM GIAGO (Nanwica Kciji) © 2012 Unity South Dakota

Thankfully we will have a slight respite of two years before the mid-term elections roll around.

It is time for all Native Americans to scrutinize their political affiliations. Have the Democrats or the Republicans fulfilled your political aspirations? Has either Party stood up for your interests?

My answer to both questions is no. With that in mind I decided to separate myself from both parties and I chose to register as an Independent. Every Native American of voting age should make that determination.

In states with large Native American populations the so-called Indian vote can make or break a candidate. There is political clout in that demographic. Is it being utilized for the betterment of the Native American condition? I think not.

If the majority of Indian voters would become registered as Independents neither the Democrats nor the Republicans would take their votes for granted. For too long the Indian vote was presumed to be in the pocket of the Democrats. As a result the Republican Party never made a real effort to court that vote.

If the majority of Native Americans were Independents it would put an entirely new face on the politics of Indian Country. Both major parties would pursue the Native vote with equal vigor.

As an Independent I had the clear choice of voting for the person I decided to be the best qualified candidate. I supported a Republican, Kristi Noem, for the House of Representatives because her opponent, Matt Varilek, a lifetime Democrat who worked under the auspices of Sen. Tim Johnson (D-SD) in the area of economic development, had done absolutely nothing to improve the economic conditions of the nine Indian reservations in South Dakota. He talked a big game but failed to deliver. I believed it was time for a change.

Insanity is doing the same thing over and over and expecting a different result. And that is the way it has been for Native Americans. We have been supporting one political party for too many years and yet, in South Dakota at least, we remain among the poorest people in America. Where have the promises of all the Democrats gone?

The Indian Health Service has done such a poor job that the life expectancy of Native Americans is among the lowest in this country. When Kathleen Sebelius, Secretary of Health and Human Services, visited several Indian hospitals in South Dakota she never let the press know where she would be or when. As a result reporters from the local daily newspaper or from the Indian press did not have the opportunity to question her. One member of her entourage let it slip that she did not want the press notified because she was "afraid there would be protestors."

"Afraid there would be protestors?" Now what does that say about the closed door policies of this administration? The secrecy in the Indian Health Service under Sebelius and Native American Yvette Roubideaux has been stifling. When Ms. Roubideaux visited the Indian Health Service Hospital in Rapid City at the beginning of her term as administrator she refused to allow the press to question her and, indeed, ducked the press entirely.

Now I am talking about Democrats here and I have only touched on their failures in economic development and in health and human services.

When I spoke face-to-face with Sen. Johnson and Varilek in Rapid City recently about economic development neither had a clue about how to provide it. They spoke about the money they had provided to non-profit organizations who in turn were supposed to provide the funds and expertise to expectant Indian entrepreneurs. All one need do is to look at the abysmal records of these organizations to know that they are also absolute failures. Where is the economic development on Indian reservations they were supposed to encourage and provide?

These non-profit economic development organizations are political. Therefore, they cannot or will not assist any business venture headed by one with differing political views. And, as I wrote about in the past, Sen. Johnson is unable to do much for anyone on any Indian reservation since earmarks became passé.

Republicans like Sen. John Thune (R-SD) and Kristi Noem (R-SD) are now the people in power. The Native Americans in South Dakota would be fools not to utilize the power and influence of these elected officials. So please stop thinking that the Democrats will bring you manna from heaven. They are no longer in power and in order to move forward you must change your way of thinking.

As an Independent I choose to work with Thune and Noem in any way possible to advance the programs of the Indian tribes and to find ways to provide real economic development on the Indian reservations in South Dakota. That is what is known as common sense.

It will be two years before the mid-term elections and the seat of Sen. Johnson will be up for grabs and who is to say that he will not be replaced by a Republican.

So I advise all Indians, especially those in South Dakota, to get on the Independent bandwagon and learn to play both sides against the middle because, after all, both sides have been playing you.

Tim Giago, an Oglala Lakota, was born and raised on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. He was the founder and first president of the Native American Journalists Association, a Nieman Fellow at Harvard, and he was inducted into the South Dakota Newspaper Hall of Fame in 2007.

The adventures of Toni and Dean

Around the Campfire

© Copyright 2012

My BW (Beautiful Wife) Toni went with me to recruit students last week. She had never been with me to do that before. We drove 700 miles in three days, visiting 11 schools in the process. She was astonished at what we saw. It was great to have fresh eyes looking at something I have been seeing for 40 years. She has been a registered nurse since 1964, the last 30 years working in nursing homes and hospice care. She knows her business well; she has run four nursing homes very successfully.

Right after we took over Alcatraz, the late Tom Mudd gave us $10,000 worth of Cyprus Mines stock. He named five people to decide what to do with it. When we met as a group, no one had a clue about what we should do. So we decided to meet again the following week and decide. I looked into the whole arena of scholarships, and came in with a proposal to use the money for scholarships. Little did I know at the time that it was the direction for the rest of my life.

Tom was the grandson of the president of Cyprus Mines, which is a huge international company. It is so big that he built a whole college, Harvey Mudd College, in southern California. Tom was writing a movie script when he first came to Alcatraz. Later he went back to Stanford and earned his doctorate. Over the next eight years he and I became great friends. He came to our house for Thanksgiving. I visited him at his house on a regular basis.

Between 1970 and 1978 we operated the Native American Scholarship Fund off my kitchen table. Toni and I stuffed thousands of letters on that kitchen table, after our babies went to sleep at night. Then I went away to be President of Bacone College, and the scholarship fund died. James Lujan, Pat Locke, Jodie Palmer and I started it again in 1986. We have produced 775 graduates, almost all of whom are working.

Toni told me when we got home that I was passionate and enthusiastic about getting Indian kids educated. It's either that or I'm a nut case. The mountain in front of us is huge and hard to climb. You see, almost none of the school people believe Indian kids can or should go to college. The worst case was in Gallup, where the high school counselor said there was nothing she could do to help the Indian kids get ready for college, or get into college.

I told her about my hero Frank Kattnig, who transformed Tohatchi High School. He went there in 1984 and stayed until he retired in 1999, a total of 15 years. The year before he got there, only 15% of the high school graduates went on to college. Within five years, Frank had 90% of them going to college. Unfortunately, when Frank retired, his beautiful program died.

Her response was, "Well, I guess I'm just a dog." I said, "That's not what I meant. I never insult anybody. I was simply telling you what Frank did." But she was totally put off. I realize that Gallup is a racist frontier town, and it would take the movement of heaven and earth to change it.

Toni asked me how many applications we got from the first school we visited. I told her I have been to that school for five straight years, and have not received even one application. It's frustrating. I met with all four classes at Santa Fe Indian School last fall, over 220 students. To my surprise, we got e-mails from 12 students; I was sure we would not hear from more than four of them. But out of the 12, none finished the process and applied to us for scholarship money. I sent individual e-mails to all of them three times. Still we got no applications.

I have 1,045 counselors on my mailing list. We send letters to them every fall. Two years ago I started keeping track of all we heard from. That list is only 19 people. Counselors at Indian schools are not there to help Indian kids get into college. Their emphasis is on technical and vocational education, the kinds of things that the racist inventor of Indian boarding schools pushed. Richard Pratt, the founder of Carlisle Indian School, said thousands of times, "Kill the Indian and save the man." He meant that any trace of Indianness had to go. Indian schools are totally into the assimilation mode.

No one knows or cares about scholarships. Despite the fact that there are 1.5 million scholarships in the U. S. now, no one is pushing Indian kids to take advantage of this great resource. As soon as you mention college or scholarships in an Indian school, someone pipes up and says, "Well, not all our students are cut out for college.

We have to prepare them for something they can do."

I have heard that at least a thousand times, from principals, superintendents, teachers, and school board members. No one says, "Let's design a program so our kids will have the option to go to college." The handful of schools that have done that have worked wonders. Wellpinit High School sent 100% of its graduates on to college in 2003. Navajo Prep sent 100% to college in 2004. Chugach sent only one kid to college between 1974 and 1994, but after completely revamping its whole program, they are now sending large numbers on to college.

Toni also wanted to know how many Indian businesses are located in Gallup. "Probably two to five," I told her. She said, "But isn't Gallup where there are so many millionaires?"

"Yes," I said. "There are over 350 millionaires in this town, out of a population of 19,000. There are more millionaires in Gallup than in any other place on earth. But they're not Indians. The largest Ford truck dealership in the world is located in Gallup, but it is owned and run by the Gurley family and has been for almost a century."

"There are 80 Indian jewelry manufacturers in Gallup," I told her. "But the owners are non-Indians. Indians do the grunt work, and get paid less than minimum wage, because they do piecework. The jewelry people mark up the things they buy one hundred percent. With little overhead, they buy something for $50 and sell it for $1,000. It's a big business."

Then I remembered my friend Penny Emerson, who used to be one of my board members. Penny is Navajo, and was graduated from St. Michaels Indian School. She has a remarkable story. She was a millionaire before she was 30, sold that business and went to college. Then she went back into business and has diversified. She now has over 400 employees, in Gallup, Houston at NASA headquarters, Nellis AFB in Las Vegas, and elsewhere. She operates a home health care business and a transportation business out of Gallup. I just wish there were a hundred more like Penny.

I told Toni about my four yearly visits to one school on the northern part of the Navajo reservation. We got no applications from that school for the whole four years. I recruited at another reservation school in southern Arizona for four straight years, which also produced no applicants at all.

She says there is a difference between our generation and the younger one. We had stable homes, got guidance from parents and family, and worked toward goals. Kids today, she says, don't have stable homes, don't have career paths laid out for them, and are floundering. Too many of them think they are entitled to things and don't have to work hard. Job, car, house, salary—they are entitled to have it.

No one knows scholarships, she says, and kids are not getting guidance to help them get money for college. FastWeb, the comprehensive scholarship site, has 1.5 million entries in its database. It is a gold mine, just waiting for someone to come along to mine the gold.

She appreciated the quality time we had together, something we don't get a lot of. We have two daughters and two granddaughters living with us or close by, so much of our time is taken up by baby sitting, taking kids to school and doctors, shopping, cooking, washing dishes, and other everyday things. It's wonderful to for us to have quality time together. We're still in love with each other.

"It's a huge mountain," I told her. But I don't regret climbing it. I just wish it weren't so hard. I wish we could get some help from the schools. We have produced 40 doctors, but we need 400. The schools need to do more to help. These kids cannot read. They are leaving high school with sixth grade reading ability. Is it any wonder that 80% of them flunk out of college?

Schools need to do so many things they are not doing now. They need to raise attendance to above 95% and hold it there. They need to put kids into language arts for the first ninety minutes every day. They need to have college people coming to schools on a regular basis. They need to put kids into Upward Bound, GEAR UP, and similar programs from seventh grade on. They need to make sure kids are reading heavily on their own outside of school. They need to develop strong bonds between teachers and parents. They need to reduce their high teacher turnover rate. They need to assign homework every day. They need to put kids into challenging classes. Come on, people.

Choctaw Nation employing aggressive cultural revitalization program

LARISSA COPELAND Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

DURANT, Okla. – The rich and diverse culture and language of this country's Native American people is more than something to be put on display at weekend craft shows and expos or a hobby to pass the time – it's a livelihood, an identity. Unfortunately, for many tribes, pieces of that identity have been lost or have been faded throughout the generations, and the Choctaw Nation is no different.

However, the Choctaw Nation is taking steps every day to reconnect current generations with their ancestral roots, and the tribe has placed the revitalization of its culture on the forefront of its priorities.

"My long-term vision is that every generation in the future is more self-sufficient and successful than the generation preceding," says Chief Gregory E. Pyle. "To achieve this, it is important we understand the culture and history of the Choctaw people. It is vital that the traditions of our great tribe be sustained."

Leaders of the tribe wanted to give members from coast to coast the opportunity to learn about and experience this living, thriving culture for themselves...so they took to the road. "Choctaw Days" is a name that has become synonymous with experiencing the culture and heritage of the Choctaw Choctaw Days festivals are celebrations of Choctaw history, art, dancing, language, music, food, and more, put on display at various locations across the nation and are presented by the passionate teachers, artists, dancers and craftsmen who make conserving Choctaw heritage a way of life.

In the past year, the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma hosted the second annual Choctaw Days festival at the Smithsonian's National Museum of the American Indian in Washington, D.C., held Choctaw Day at the State Capitol of Oklahoma, in San Francisco, Calif., Denver, Colo., Bakersfield, Calif., and many more cities across the nation and have a busy schedule slated for the next year.

These events are just a tiny snapshot of the huge picture; the efforts and undertaking the tribe is making to preserve its precious, priceless identity is vast and requires the dedication and hard work of so many.

All across the Choctaw Nation, classes, large and small, formal and informal, are being held to help pass down the traditional ways of life of those who came before us and instill in the children the need to continue to pass on this knowledge for generations to come.

From pottery and Native art, to stickball and beadwork, the old ways of the Choctaw are making a comeback after being so close to becoming forgotten at one time.

One sacred element to the Choctaw culture is its language. The Native language is spoken in the homes of many Choctaws, and has even earned the distinction of being named the first Native American language to be offered as a minor at Southeastern Oklahoma State University. It is offered as a distance learning language option in more than 40 high schools and three colleges in Oklahoma as well.

The Choctaw Nation School of Choctaw Language offers classes, which are taught by certified language instructors who are eager to preserve and perpetuate the language and culture of the tribe. At present, the school has approximately certified instructorswho teach the language communities all across the Choctaw Nation beyond. example, at the Choctaw Community Center Antlers, certified language teacher Dora Wickson teaches classes every week. Her beginner classes are on Mondays from 6 to 8 p.m., and advanced Choctaw classes are on Wednesday evenings from 6 to 8 p.m. These classes are open to the public. The course is 16 weeks long and is taught in four phases.

"We just started up a new class and it's not too late to join us," said Wickson. "We would love to have anyone that is interested in speaking the language to come out and learn Choctaw."

The classes taught by Wickson and the numerous other certified Choctaw instructors are just one example of the numerous Choctaw language programs offered by the Choctaw Nation. To learn more, visit www.choctawschool.com.

Traditional Choctaw dance is now being highlighted as well, most recently with the Choctaw Employee Dance Troupe. The group, organized by Choctaw Nation Marketing Director Lana Sleeper, is made up of tribal employees, all who volunteer traditional Choctaw clothing, all of which is handmade, from the Choctaw diamond shirts and dresses, to the intricate beaded collars, necklaces and earrings. "I'm hoping in time we'll grow, with more employee volunteers joining the group and learning the dances," says Sleeper.

Also today, thanks to the nonprofit Chahta Foundation, the social dancing experience has now been extended even to those unable to attend the performancesorpresentations.

pottery in a wood fire, and how to cook in and eat out of the finished pottery, according to Thompson.

The class is open to and welcomes anyone, from beginner to advanced students, who are interested in learning the art of pottery. "The teachers and experienced students can teach people with any level of experience," he says

The department also teaches pottery at various locations around the area as requested.

their time, spending many hours each month practicing and perfecting the traditional dances they perform at community functions, such as parades, festivals or anywhere the group is invited to attend around the tribal area. "We do a short presentation," Sleeper explains, "telling the story of each dance, then explaining the steps. We then perform and we pull in people from the crowd and have them dance with us."

The dance group came about as part of Chief Pyle and Assistant Chief Batton's cultural awakening initiative. "Only a small group of people knew these Choctaw social dances," Sleeper continued, "and we wanted to spread that knowledge so that all Choctaws could learn the dances."

Sleeper started a social dance program in 2009, but on a smaller scale - at the tribe's 13 Head Start centers, making weekly visits to the classrooms to teach the dances to the students. It was because of her experiences while teaching the youngsters that she was inspired to organize the employee dance troupe. "It was then that I saw how many others wanted to learn the dances too," she says, and that is when the dance troupe was formed. Approximately 14 employees from various departments dance the group, all dressed in

The foundation recently produced an instructional dance DVD utilizing the talents of the group.

"The Head Starts actually use the DVDs now too," says Sleeper, "The teachers lead the lessons and we provide the shirts for the children."

Additionally, the Choctaw Nation Historic Preservation Department works adamantly to ensure the traditions of the tribe are not lost by doing its part to pass on the many trades and ancestral skills of the Choctaw. One such craft is pottery.

The department hosts biweekly pottery classes in Antlers and Durant, free of charge for anyone who wants to attend and learn the skill. The two classes, held on alternating Thursdays, meet at the Antlers Public Library, located at 104 SE 2nd St., and in Durant at the Choctaw Cultural Services Building, at 4451 Choctaw Rd., from 5-8 p.m.

Students of the classes, which are led by Director of Historic Preservation Dr. Ian Thompson, are taught the traditional Choctaw methods of digging clay, cleaning clay, and preparing the appropriate materials, such as sand or mussel shell, to mix with the clay. They also learn traditional methods for making different types of Choctaw pottery, the traditional designs used on the pottery, how to fire the

In addition to the pottery classes, Historic Preservation and Cultural Services departments teach many programs throughout the year on the cultural ways of the Choctaw including moccasinmaking, archery, bow-making, beading and basketry classes.

"We can also give presentations by request on the food, history and life ways of the Choctaw people," says Thompson. More information can be found at www. choctawnationculture.com.

Employees of the Choctaw Nation have embraced the tribal heritage and the tribe has officially made the first Monday of each month "Heritage Monday" at all its office buildings. On that day, employees put forth a conscious effort to dress traditionally, greet guests in the Native language and share the unique Choctaw culture through social dancing, history and storytelling, songs, crafts and traditional food.

No matter how large or small the endeavor, each act in this cultural awakening, this revitalization – this assurance that the history and characteristics that define who we are as a tribe and a people, are perpetuated, protected and maintained – will continue to be fuel in keeping the tribe alive and thriving for years to come and ensure a prosperous future generation of Choctaws.

Dr. Ian Thompson, right, tells Chief Gregory E. Pyle about the history of Choctaw pottery during a pottery class at the tribal complex in Durant.

HELENA, Mont. (AP) - After nearly 17 years of courtroom arguments, congressional negotiations and Indian Country bickering, hundreds of thousands of Native Americans could see the first payments of a $3.4 billion U.S. government settlement by the end of the year, plaintiffs' attorneys said Monday.

The settlement between American Indians across the nation and the government over more than a century's worth of squandered and mismanaged land trust royalties became final on Friday, when the appeal period expired.

One of the largest U.S. government settlements in history began with a lawsuit filed in 1996 by Elouise Cobell of Browning, Mont. The Blackfeet leader observed that those who leased Indian land made money from its natural resources, while the Indians themselves remained in poverty with no accounting of the royalties from that land that were held in trust for them by the government Cobell herself led the fight against the government for more than 15 years before she died of cancer last year.

"We all are happy that this settlement can finally be implemented," lead attorney Dennis Gingold said in a statement Monday. "We deeply regret that Ms. Cobell did not live to see this day."

BILLINGS, Mont. (AP) - An elder from Montana's Crow Indian Tribe whose family ceremoniously adopted then-Sen. Barack Obama during the 2008 presidential race has died.

Hartford "Sonny" Black Eagle Jr. died Monday at his home in Lodge Grass on the tribe's reservation in the southeastern part of the state, said his son, Crow tribal Chairman Cedric Black Eagle.

The 78-year-old traditional healer died in his sleep after battling respiratory problems stemming from a severe case of pneumonia several months ago, Cedric Black Eagle said.

President Obama called Black Eagle's wife, Mary, on Wednesday to express his condolences, a White House official said.

A top Interior Department official who is a member of the tribe said Black Eagle's death was an "enormous loss for the Crow nation."

Wilma Mankiller celebrated during film's Okla. premiere

KAREN SHADE Native American Times

TULSA, Okla. - Hundreds of hands went into making the new feature film The Cherokee Word for Water, but one name was most on the minds and hearts filling the Oklahoma Jazz Hall of Fame for Thursday evening's special premiere event in Tulsa.

Wilma Mankiller, former principal chief of the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma, was celebrated by an audience packing the ballroom where the film was screened for the first time. When it was over, everyone understood why Mankiller never wanted the film to be about her.

"Wilma wanted the film to get the message across to America that Native people do contribute to economic development and education. They are sharing the load," said Charlie Soap in an interview before the screening.

The Cherokee Word for Water is set in the early 1980s when a young Mankiller pulls up to her mother's home in Adair County with her two teenage daughters. Having grown up in San Francisco, Calif., Mankiller, played by actress Kimberly Guerrero (Cherokee, Colville, Salish-Kootenai), has returned to her birthplace. She has also come back to help her people and

Wyoming tribe asks judge to reconsider eagle case

CHEYENNE, Wyo. (AP) - A Wyoming Indian tribe is asking a federal judge to reconsider a recent ruling that the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service acted properly in prohibiting the tribe from killing bald eagles for religious purposes on its central Wyoming reservation.

The Northern Arapaho Tribe this week asked U.S. District Judge Alan B. Johnson of Cheyenne to change the ruling he entered earlier this month.

The Fish and Wildlife Service earlier this year granted the Northern Arapaho the nation's first permit allowing it to kill up to two bald eagles a year for religious purposes.

But Johnson upheld the federal agency's requirement that the Northern Arapaho couldn't kill the birds on the Wind River Indian Reservation because of objections from the Eastern Shoshone Tribe, which shares the reservation.

Fallin stresses good relations with Okla. tribes

SEAN MURPHYAssociated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP)

- While her office remains entangled in a lawsuit with two of Oklahoma's largest Native American tribes over water rights, Gov. Mary Fallin emphasized last Tuesday that productive relationships between the state and tribes are critical to Oklahoma's economy.

Officials from about 20 of the state's 38 federally recognized tribes joined Fallin at the state Capitol for an event recognizing a national proclamation of November as Native American Heritage month.

"In Oklahoma

appreciate and respect the impact that the tribes have had upon our state's economy, on the jobs that have been created, certainly upon our culture," Fallin said. "One of my top priorities as governor of Oklahoma has been to strengthen our economy, grow our jobs, to help our Oklahoma families be able to have a better quality of life, and the tribal governments ... are important partners in helping us grow the prosperity of all Oklahoma citizens."

The governor's office is involved in negotiations with the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations in their dispute with the state over control of water in southeastern Oklahoma. A lawsuit filed by the tribes, which seeks to bar the state and Oklahoma City from transporting water from the region, is on hold while the two sides work with a court-appointed mediator.

A spokesman for Fallin said both sides are prohibited from discussing the mediation talks because of the court's gag order in the case.

The governor's office passed a bill last year to eliminate the state's Indian Affairs Commission and replace the state agency with a Native American liaison post in her office. Although Native American lawmakers initially voiced opposition, several tribal officials last week said they are pleased to be working directly with Jacque Hensley, a citizen of the Kaw Nation appointed by Fallin to the post in July.

Fallin said Hensley is meeting regularly with tribal officials across the state and briefing the governor weekly on the current state of tribal relations.

"I think the turnout you had today showed that it is positive," said Brian McLain, executive director of legislative advocacy for the Choctaw Nation. "I think (Fallin) hit the nail right on the head – working together is beneficial for all Oklahomans."

Ron Sparkman, chief of the Shawnee Tribe and a former member of the Indian Affairs Commission, said he was concerned when lawmakers abolished the panel but that he is looking forward to working with the governor and Hensley.

"That's something the governor wanted to do, and that's her prerogative. We respect that," Sparkman said. "Ms. Hensley has been to our meetings and put forth the effort, and I hope that continues."

Besides the lawsuit over water rights, Fallin's office also is involved in negotiations with 28 different tribes over tobacco compacts with the state that regulate the tribal sale of tobacco products in Oklahoma. The current compacts were negotiated with Fallin's predecessor, former Democratic Gov. Brad Henry, and are set to expire in 2013, according to the governor's office.

Tulsa County announces Creek naming rights deal on Thurs. meeting agenda

TULSA, Okla. – Tulsa County officials have said an agreement with a local tribe will be revisited Thursday.

The regular December meeting of the Tulsa County Public Facilities Authority is scheduled for 9 a.m. Thursday at the ExpoServe Building, located at 3902 E. 15th St. Among the agenda items is one concerning the recent naming rights acquisition by the Muscogee (Creek) Nation. The specific concerns to be addressed at the meeting will be announced prior.

In November, officials with the Muscogee (Creek) Nation announced the tribe had purchased the naming rights for the Expo Square at the Tulsa County Fairgrounds for $1.44 million through 2019. The agreement, which was approved unanimously without comment by the Tulsa County Public Facilities Authority, included a provision that would end live horse racing at Fair Meadows, a track located on the eastern edge of the fairgrounds, thus cutting out millions of dollars in gaming compact funds that were used to supplement race purses at tracks across Oklahoma.

"Our interest was in the naming rights only," Muscogee (Creek) Nation Principal Chief George Tiger said Thursday night, Nov. 29. "The Muscogee (Creek) Nation has nothing to do with horse racing or stopping it at Fair Meadows."

The agreement has since come under fire from horse racing groups and a member of the Oklahoma legislature, claiming the Tulsa County Facilities Authority was not wholly transparent in the process and is causing irrevocable damage to the Oklahoma horse racing industry by closing one of the state's three active live racing tracks.

"Whatever happens on the other side of the plate is not our fault," Tiger said. "The Tulsa County Fair Board had something that we were interested in and we went after it. That is all there is to it."

OKEMAH, Okla. – Representatives from the Oklahoma National Guard and Thlopthlocco Tribal Town signed a memorandum of understanding Thursday.

Signed at the tribal town's complex, the MOU covers historical and cultural preservation efforts made by both sides and would require the National Guard to contact Thlopthlocco officials if tribal remains are inadvertently discovered during unit activities in the town's jurisdictional area.

"As part of the MOU, whatever they (the National Guard) find, they are going to do an educational component on it for our young people instead of just putting them in a shed," Thlopthlocco Tribal Town Tribal History Project Officer Charles Coleman said. "Out of the shed and into the head. This is information our young people need to know."

This is the tribal town's second MOU with a division of the National Guard. In 2011, it signed a similar agreement with the Georgia National Guard's Native American consultation program, as did the United Keetoowah Band of Cherokee Indians. Prior to the Creek Confederacy's forced removal to Oklahoma, Thlopthlocco was located in eastern Alabama near what is now Wetumpka, Ala., about 100 miles from Fort Benning, Ga.

Fort Benning, Ga.

"For our tribe, this is the most important," Coleman said. "Fort Benning and Fort Gordon is where we were and where our ancestors are buried, but

One of three Muscogee (Creek) tribal towns with federal recognition, Thlopthlocco Tribal Town has an unusually high rate of military service, with more than one-third of its eligible citizens either currently serving or have previously served. The tribal town also claims the first Native American West Point graduate, David Moniac, among its pre-removal citizens.

Oklahoma is our home."

A U.S. Army veteran and retired teacher, Coleman said he sees this MOU as a way to encourage younger generations of Natives to consider military service.

"This is one of the things that the military can do and offer young people," he said. "It doesn't have to be a college education. Could be vo-tech classes or hands-on training while learning more about your tribe."

Clinic protest gathers few, members not discouraged

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON

Native American Times

MUSKOGEE, Okla. – Members of a fledgling advocacy group took to the street Nov. 27 to raise concerns about health care practices at a local clinic.

Led by Pryor, Okla., resident and Cherokee Nation citizen Ruth Fallon, members of the Native Citizens Health Care Alliance held signs across the road from the Three Rivers Dental Clinic Tuesday afternoon in an effort to draw attention to their issues with the quality of care provided at the facility.

Fallon organized the group after a visit earlier this year to the clinic for a root canal and crown. After her root canal was completed, she was informed that there was a $200 charge for a crown – something she said she was not appraised of before her appointment.

"In order to charge a fee, there has to be a bilateral agreement," she said. "You can't just impose it after the fact."

According to a spokeswoman for the clinic's operator, Cherokee Nation, the dental clinic recently added a pilot program to make crowns on-site and charges the fee to cover the costs of materials.

In late 2011, the Cherokee Nation enacted legislation to allocate an additional 5 percent of casino profits to contract health services which covers specialty medical needs that might not necessarily be available at IHS facilities. However, those additional funds are listed in the tribe's 2013 budget as specifically for dentures and eyeglasses. They are also limited to citizens within the tribe's 14-county jurisdiction.

Although only three members of the Native Citizens Health Care Alliance attended Tuesday's protest, the attendees were not discouraged by the turnout and hung their extra signs along the wire fence across from the clinic.

"Three is more than enough," member Ollie Starr said. "We will still make our voices heard."

Another of the organization's members, Betsy Swimmer, went inside the clinic during the two-hour protest to schedule dental and eye appoints. She said while inside, she received conflicting information from employees about whether appointments could be scheduled in person and whether patients must live within the Cherokee Nation's 14-county jurisdictional area in order to be seen.

"I went through the process to make sure I wasn't speaking out of turn," Swimmer said. "When you have Council people and elected officials promising to make health care a priority, it is disappointing to have to experience something like this."

The organization also had members outside at a Cherokee Nation community meeting that night in Dewey, Okla., and outside the tribe's Council House last Thursday afternoon while the legislative branch held committee meetings. Fallon has written to officials with Indian Health Services about her concerns and experiences at the clinic.

Tribes raise $9M for sacred SD land

KRISTI EATON
Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP)

– After months of highprofile fundraising that drew celebrities' attention and dollars, a group of Native American tribes has raised $9 million to buy a piece of land in South Dakota's Black Hills that they consider sacred, an official with an Indian land foundation said Friday.

The Indian Land Tenure Foundation president Cris Stainbrook told The Associated Press that the tribes raised enough money to purchase the land from its current owners. The foundation was one of several groups and organizations leading the effort to buy the land.

The deal was finalized Friday, which was the deadline for the tribes to raise the money.

The land, known as Pe' Sla, went up for sale after being privately owned. Members of the Great Sioux Nation have been allowed to gather there every year to perform rituals. The site plays a key role in the tribes' creation story, and members fear new owners would develop it.

Tribal leaders from three Sioux tribes – Rosebud Sioux President Cyril Scott, Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Chairman Charlie Vig and Crow Creek Chairman Brandon Sazue – released a joint statement Friday, saying they are happy to be able to reclaim one of their sacred sites.

Those three tribes were the only ones to contribute to the purchase, Scott said. Tribal leaders would not say how much each tribe contributed to the purchase.

The three leaders said they exercised their tribal sovereign authority.

"It's a great day for Indian Country," Scott said in a phone interview with The Associated Press. Scott also said that all Sioux tribal members are invited to the land and that tribal leaders plan to form a commission to preserve the land.

More than $900,000 was raised through online contributions, said Standing Rock Sioux tribal member Chase Iron Eyes. His company, Last Real Indians, led the online effort.

Earlier this year, landowners Leonard and Margaret Reynolds canceled a public auction of the property after tribal members expressed outrage. The Reynolds' then accepted the tribes' bid to purchase the land for $9 million.

The couple has repeatedly said they will not speak publicly about the land sale and did not return a message from The AP on Friday seeking comment.

The fundraising effort drew support from several celebrities. P. Diddy tweeted about it as did Bette Midler, who also donated. Midler said she was "happy and proud" to have helped out with the purchase.

"I've been talking about it to my friends, tweeting to the world and donating through my foundation because I think it's important for the soul of our nation," she said in a statement Friday.

Actor Ezra Miller, who appeared in the recently released film "The Perks of Being a Wallflower," and music producer Sol Guy flew to South Dakota last month to film a nine-minute documentary-style video about the land that was used as part of an online campaign to raise funds.

The fundraising effort has been a monumental and controversial undertaking for the Sioux tribes. An 1868 treaty set aside the Black Hills and other land for the Sioux, but Congress passed a law in 1877 seizing the land following the discovery of gold in western South Dakota.

A 1980 U.S. Supreme Court ruling awarded more than $100 million to the Sioux tribes for the Black Hills, but the tribes have refused to accept the money, saying the land has never been for sale. There are Sioux tribes in the Dakotas, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska and Canada.

Some members of the Sioux tribes didn't agree with trying to purchase the land. Bryan Brewer, president-elect of the Oglala Sioux Tribe, said his tribe did not allocate any money to the land purchase.

"I'm still against buying something we own, but I'm thrilled the tribes' are buying it. I'm very happy about it," he said.

American Indian bones closer to returning to earth

They are "culturally affiliated" with current-day tribes, the Caddo Nation of Oklahoma and the Osage Nation.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP) – The bones of Native Americans who once farmed in what is now western Arkansas are one step closer to returning to the earth after they were dug out of the ground.

The Ozark-St. Francis National Forest has completed an inventory of 28 sets of human remains and artifacts and determined that they are "culturally affiliated" with current-day tribes, the Caddo Nation of Oklahoma and the Osage Nation, the Arkansas-Democrat Gazette reported Sunday.

That means the bones can be claimed by the tribes and returned under the Native American Grave Repatriation Act, a law signed by George H.W. Bush in 1990.

Since the law took effect, more than 38,600 human remains and nearly 1 million associated funerary objects have been returned to tribes, according to the National Park Service.

In some cases, looters dug up centuries-old burial mounds and carted away the bones. In others, scientists found the gravesites while looking for clues about how American Indians lived and died in the past.

"The Caddo have a long history of being dug up over the years by archaeologists and looters," said Robert Cast, tribal historic preservation officer for the Caddo Nation, a tribe of about 5,000 people that has governmental offices near Binger, Okla.

Archaeologists working with the Ouachita and Ozark-St. Francis National Forests recorded the sexes and probable ages at death of the remains that were recently inventoried, as well as any trauma and disease that the people likely endured, forest spokeswoman Tracy Farley Ozark-St. Francis Forest staff and representatives of 23 different tribes assessed the remains, the newspaper reported.

The Ozark-St. Francis Forest has other remains in its possession, but Farley said she didn't know how many. She said the national forest was "just beginning" a complete inventory of them.

State, inmates far apart on ceremonial tobacco

■ A judge ordered the groups to meet and propose revisions to the tobacco policy for inmates practicing the Lakota religion.

DIRK LAMMERSAssociated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) – South Dakota corrections officials and an organization of Native American inmates are far apart on their suggested revisions to a prison policy regulating the use of tobacco in religious ceremonies.

Chief Judge Karen Schreier ruled in September that the prison system's ban on tobacco in religious ceremonies substantially burdens Native American inmates' religious rights. The state had argued that ceremonial tobacco inside the state penitentiary was increasingly abused.

Schreier ordered the groups to meet and propose revisions to the tobacco policy for inmates practicing the Lakota religion. If they couldn't reach a consensus, they were asked to submit individual written proposals.

The South Dakota prison system went tobacco-free in 2000 but made an exception for tobacco used in Native American ceremonies. Officials in October 2009 eliminated that exemption, saying tobacco was being sold or bartered and inmates had been caught separating it from their pipe mixtures and tobacco ties.

The state in its brief is agreeing to allow tobacco at pipe ceremonies but wants the right to prohibit its use in tobacco ties – which embody a small amount of tobacco in cloth – in prayer flags and inside the prison's sweat lodge. It also wants to cap the tobacco mix at 1 percent and require that prisoners use only finely ground cherry-blend tobacco.

The inmates group wants tobacco allowed at all four of those circumstances. It is agreeing to limit the mix to 10 percent, but says it should not be ground, as that makes the mixtures almost impossible to smoke.

The group agrees to have pipe ceremonies in locations that are under video surveillance, but wants an exception for pipe ceremonies inside the sweat lodge, which has surveillance outside.

The inmates' attorney, Pamela Bollweg, said Tuesday that she'd wait to comment until Schreier issues her final ruling.

James Moore, the officials' attorney, did not return a telephone call seeking comment.

The parties have until Dec. 4 to file objections to the other group's proposal.

Members of prison-based Native American Council of Tribes sued after the 2009 exemption was eliminated, saying the policy change violated their U.S. constitutional rights ensuring that no prisoner be penalized or discriminated against for their religious beliefs or practices. Inmates Blaine Brings Plenty and Clayton Creek argued that for Native American prayer to be effective, it must be embodied in tobacco and offered within a ceremonial framework.

The state argued that the policy was not overly restrictive because it allowed other botanicals, such as red willow bark, to be burned.

The Justice Department, in a brief filed in July, said the state's position ran contrary to the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act and U.S. Supreme Court precedent.

Schreier said in her September ruling said that even if state officials had asserted a compelling governmental interest, they did not prove that the complete ban was the least restrictive means available to further that governmental interest.

Tribal curriculum available to state's schools

For the past seven years, tribes across Washington have been working with educators in their respective school districts to develop the curriculum.

PHIL FEROLITO Yakima Herald-Republic

WHITE SWAN, Wash. (AP) – A picture of Chief Little Crow was plastered across the first page of a PowerPoint presentation that 13-year-old Brandon Spencer was assembling at White Swan High School one recent morning.

"He's part of a Sioux tribe and I'm part of a Sioux tribe," the eighth-grader and Yakama tribal member said about the chief who led the Mdewakanton Dakota Sioux in the mid-1800s.

Sitting next to Spencer was 14-year-old Darnell Williams, also an eighth-grader. He was working on a presentation about Sitting Bull, once chief of the Hunkpapa Lakota Sioux

"He was a good chief," Williams said. "He was tough."

Both Spencer and Darnell are taking a recently implemented tribal sovereignty class in the Mt. Adams School District.

"I like this class because I can learn more about my culture, my tribe and other tribes," Spencer said

Adopted by the state Office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, the tribal sovereignty curriculum that covers the history, culture and governments of tribes across the country with an emphasis on Washington tribes is available to school districts across the state. The curriculum can be used in elementary, middle and high schools, and to satisfy social studies credit requirements. Education plans in the curriculum can be modified to fit each school district and corresponding tribe.

The curriculum is open to all students and is not only designed to teach members of the state's 29 federally recognized tribes about their own history, government and culture, but also to educate non-Indians about tribal communities.

The online curriculum is the result of a bill signed into law by Gov. Chris Gregoire in 2005 that encourages school districts on or near Indian reservations to incorporate tribal studies. Bill sponsor Rep. John McCoy, D-Tulalip and a Tulalip tribal member, said the absence of Indian studies in public schools left a gaping hole in history classes and caused a disconnect between schools and Native Americans.

For the past seven years, tribes across the state – including the Yakama – have been working with educators in their respective school districts to develop the curriculum, which can be found at www.indian-ed.org. Also covered in the curriculum are the treaties Northwestern tribes signed with the U.S. government, and how their traditional hunting, fishing and food gathering rights in their original territories were reserved.

The new curriculum also has drawn the interest of Heritage University in Toppenish, which plans to incorporate it into the college's indigenous studies program next year, said Winona Wynn, head of university's English and humanities department. She will head the indigenous program next year

"We want to retain and respond to our native students and we want them to feel a sense of belonging at our university," she said.

There are three public school districts on the 1.2 million-acre Yakama reservation: Mt. Adams, Wapato and Toppenish.

The Toppenish district, which is in its second year of teaching tribal sovereignty, has been a training ground for teachers at other districts who want to implement the curriculum. Involving tribal elders who are responsible for passing on tribal history, culture and spiritual beliefs to younger generations has been instrumental, said Yakama tribal member Patsy Whitefoot, who is the Indian education director for the Toppenish School District, where Native Americans account for more than 12 percent of the students.

"There's a lot involved in this," Whitefoot said. "I think the uniqueness in all this is being able to get people together to talk about what it means to be a Yakama."

Although the Wapato School District sent teachers to the training, it hasn't decided whether to implement the curriculum. But it encourages teachers to incorporate tribal culture into classes when appropriate, district spokesman Mike Balmelli said in an email. Native Americans account for nearly 20 percent of students in that district.

At White Swan High School, the class has already generated excitement among students who otherwise lost interest in school, said language arts teacher Peggy Sanchey, who teaches the tribal sovereignty class. She said some students are spending two hours after school working on tribal sovereignty projects, and parents who never graduated are asking about the class. Their inquiries have school officials discussing whether to begin a GED program attached to a tribal sovereignty class for adults, she said.

White Swan is an unincorporated area deep within the Yakama reservation, where poverty is high and job opportunities slim. Faced with poverty and gang violence, students here are struggling to meet state learning standards. Last school year, only 34.7 percent of Native American students in 10th grade met state reading standards and 52.1 percent met state writing standards, according to the OSPI website. Native American students account for 54.4 percent of students in the district.

By comparison, Native American students in the Toppenish School District – 20 miles to the west on the reservation – are making significant strides. Last year, 57.1 percent of Native American 10th-graders met state reading standards while 76.2 percent met state writing standards, according to OSPI. Several programs, including STEM (science, technology, engineering and mathematics), have been credited with improving scores at the Toppenish district.

But Sanchey believes student scores in White Swan will improve with the new curriculum because it offers Native American students a sense of pride about their heritage, something formal public school settings once strived to strip away.

"More important to me is that these kids understand who they are and who their ancestors were and what they meant to their tribes," said Sanchey, also a Yakama. "These kids need to know who they are, and they're not gangsters – they're Native Americans with proud heritage behind them."

Black Eagle and his family adopted Obama when the presidential candidate visited the reservation in the weeks leading up to Montana's Democratic primary.

As part of the adoption, Obama attended a purification ceremony where he faced east, the symbolic source of new life, and was prayed over by Black Eagle. He was given a Crow name that translates as "One Who Helps People Throughout the Land."

Cedric Black Eagle said his father considered the 2008 adoption ceremony one of the proudest moments in his life and subsequently considered it his duty to make sure Native American voices were heard.

"He felt like he was representing all of Indian Country as a spokesman, and always telling his (adopted) son, the president, that he has to make sure all of the people in Indian Country are heard and try to help them all," Cedric Black Eagle said.

Obama, who referred to himself as "Barack Black Eagle" during his 2008 visit to Crow Agency, pledged at the time to improve relations between American Indian tribes and the federal government if elected.

Black Eagle and his wife were later invited to Obama's presidential inauguration, and returned to Washington, D.C., in subsequent years for the annual White House Tribal Leaders Conference. Black Eagle and other family members also attended several Christmas dinners at the White House, his son said.

During destructive flooding on the reservation last year that left Lodge Grass largely isolated and forced many tribal members from their homes, Obama called Hartford and Mary Black Eagle to check on their safety, Cedric Black Eagle said.

The Crow Tribe released a statement Wednesday calling Hartford Black Eagle a "man of peace" who was well-known for his healing work and regarded the people of the world as belonging to one family.

He was born during the Great Depression and grew up outside Lodge Grass, where his family raised cows and horses on the same land where Black Eagle would make his home as an adult. He was also known by his Crow name, Alaxalusshixiassaah, meaning "thundering hoof," according to the tribe.

After his mother died of tuberculosis when he was a baby, Black Eagle was raised by his grandparents and later became a strong advocate for preserving the Crow's traditions and culture.

He taught the Crow language to his eight children, and instructed them and others in the community on performing traditional tribal dances, Cedric Black Eagle said.

To earn a living, he worked as a carpenter, an Indian Health Service representative and, most recently, as a political adviser to his son, who earlier this month lost a bid for re-election.

His death came less than two weeks after the loss of another member of the family, 55-year-old daughter Marilyn Black Eagle, who died Nov. 16 in a two-vehicle accident.

Chippewa to judge: Night deer hunting is safe

TODD RICHMOND
Associated Press

MADISON, Wis. (AP) – Wisconsin's Chippewa tribes tried to persuade a federal judge Tuesday to allow tribal hunters to kill deer after dark, arguing the state has suddenly allowed night wolf hunting and tribal hunters are entitled to similar opportunities.

The commission that oversees the Chippewa's off-reservation rights last week quietly authorized tribal hunters to take deer at night across northern Wisconsin. The state Department of Natural Resources, which has outlawed night deer hunting out of safety concerns, balked.

A bitter legal battle has ensued between the DNR and the Chippewa. The state agency has asked U.S. District Judge Barbara Crabb to rule the state's prohibition on night deer hunting clearly extends to the tribes. The Chippewa responded Tuesday with a motion asking Crabb to issue a temporary restraining order barring the DNR from enforcing the ban on tribal members. Crabb has set a status conference for Wednesday.

"(The DNR's) concerns are meritless and discriminatory, and the state's refusal to consent to the change in tribal laws is therefore unreasonable," the filing said.

DNR officials had no immediate response.

Treaties the Chippewa

signed in the 1800s ceding 22,400 acres across northern Wisconsin to the government guarantees the tribes the right to hunt and fish as they see fit on that land. They've been running their own deer hunts in the territory for years.

Two decades ago, the tribes tried to convince Crabb during federal cases clarifying tribal harvest rights that they should be allowed to hunt deer at night. The tribes argued the state allows night fox and coyote hunting, but the judge found shooting deer in the dark with larger bullets and at higher angles presents a serious safety risk.

She ruled the state's prohibition on the practice extended to tribal hunters. The tribes worked the ban into their off-reservation codes.

Relations between the state and the Chippewa have frayed over the last year. The first problems surfaced this past spring when lawmakers tried to pass a bill loosening mining standards to help a Florida-based company open a giant iron mine south of Lake Superior. The Bad River Band of Lake Superior Chippewa feared the mine would pollute local waters and jeopardize their rice

The bill never passed, but legislators angered the tribes again when they passed a bill establishing Wisconsin's first organized wolf hunt. The Chippewa consider the wolf a brother and fought fiercely against the hunt. In September, the tribal commission authorized tribal hunters to kill an elk, a species the DNR has been working to re-introduce for nearly 20 years.

Now the tribes want to hunt deer at night.

They say the wolf hunt has changed everything: Since hunters can use large-caliber bullets to kill wolves in the dark, the DNR can no longer argue about using larger bullets to kill deer at night is too dangerous, they say.

The tribal commission and the DNR have been negotiating over night deer hunting for months, according to the filing. At first, agency officials didn't oppose the idea, but later asked the tribes to hold off for a year to avoid negative publicity. But as things drew to a head, DNR finally raised safety concerns, the filing said.

The tribes countered in the filing that their hunters must meet stringent safety standards to get a night permit, including getting firearms training from their tribe, completing an advanced hunter safety course, shining lights at deer only at the point of kill and identifying a clear field of fire during the day. The safety requirements are tougher than standards DNR sharpshooters must meet before they kill deer at night in areas infected with chronic wasting disease, the tribes added.

forward in reconciliation and a new era in how the government administers its trusts.

"With the settlement now final, we can put years of discord behind us and start a new chapter in our nation-to-nation relationship," Salazar said.

The agreement will pay out $1.5 billion to two classes of beneficiaries. Each member of the first class would be paid $1,000. Each member of the second class would be paid $800 plus a share of the balance of the settlement funds as calculated by a formula based on the activity in their trust accounts.

Another $1.9 billion would be used by the government to purchase fractionated land allotments from willing individuals and turn those consolidated allotments over to the tribe. An education scholarship for young Indians also would be established under the agreement.

Congress approved the deal in December 2010 and U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan approved it after a June 2011 hearing. Hogan said that while the settlement may not be as much as some wished, the deal ended the legal deadlock and provided some certainty for the beneficiaries.

Cobell traveled across Indian Country to explain the deal, but there was opposition. One opponent, Kimberly Craven of Boulder, Colo., took her objections to the Supreme Court, saying the settlement did not include an actual accounting for how much money the government lost and that the deal would overcompensate a select few beneficiaries.

Anadarko Warriors end streak at state championship game

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON
Native American Times

STILLWATER, Okla. - So close.

After starting the season 13-0, the Anadarko High School football team came up just short in the Class 4A championship Saturday, dropping a 21-14 heartbreaker to the Clinton Red Tornadoes at Oklahoma State University's Boone Pickens Stadium.

Leading 14-7 through three quarters, the Warriors surrendered two fourth quarter touchdowns and could not cash in on a last-minute drive, ending their 28-game winning streak and giving the Custer County school its 19th state football title.

"We've played each other at the JV (junior varsity) level for more than 30 years," AHS coach Kent Jackson said. "We play them so much that it just comes down to who works the hardest. They know what we do, we know what they do."

After winning the 2011 Class 3A state title – the Caddo County's school's first in football – Anadarko High School was bumped up a classification for the 2012 and 2013 seasons due to enrollment numbers. With three tribes headquartered in the city and four more with capitols within 40 miles of town, almost twothirds of the students enrolled in Anadarko Public Schools are Native American.

"Sometimes it's hard to get a positive image out about our kids outside of the community," Jackson said. "Our Native kids are just as good as anybody and have proven it with athletics."

Over the last three seasons, the Warriors have gone a combined 40-2, with their two losses being a 42-33 defeat by Tulsa Metro Christian Academy in the 2010 Class 3A quarterfinals and Saturday's game. Prior to the championship, the Warriors gave up 85 points over 13 games and outscored their opponents by an average of more than 31 points.

"The community's been really good to us," senior Galen Satoe said. We've seen a lot of support and we thank them for it."

"This has been a long time coming," Jackson said. "We didn't have many traditions here for a long time. My first two or three years here were pretty rough, but we've come a long way and we're proud of these kids.

Okla. Christian signs C&A player

CEDRIC SUNRAY

EDMOND, Okla. - Christmas came early this year for an Oklahoma college. For the second year in a row, another top American Indian student-athlete has placed their academic and athletic future in the hands of Oklahoma Christian University. Last year's signee, Brandon Little Axe (Absentee Shawnee), previously lead his 6A Norman North High School soccer team to undefeated state and national championships prior to beginning his first season at Oklahoma Christian. In his first season he would join new teammate Tom Tippeconnic (Comanche/Navajo), while earning starting minutes and a number of goals and assists which demonstrated he was more than capable of making the jump from the high school to collegiate level.

This year, OC wouldn't have to wait until late in the school year to sign a marquee Indian athlete. "I could see myself there right away. The coaching staff was great. I was able to see them play this past year and their fast paced style seemed like a great match." The individual making these statements is Perkins-Tryon High School senior girl's basketball player Jordan Gorham (Cheyenne & Arapaho/Kiowa), who has been instrumental in her school's recent trips to the state basketball tournament. This past season she averaged over 16 points and 10 rebounds per game and for good measure scored 33 points and posted 19 rebounds in the first round of the state tournament. She has further garnered All-Tournament, All-City, All-Area, and All-State honors during her time in high school, all while maintaining a 3.7 GPA.

In speaking with Oklahoma Christian's veteran women's basketball coach Stephanie Findley, it was easy to understand the mutual respect the coaching staff and Jordan already share for one another. "We are very excited about having signed Jordan. We are graduating our most physical post player this year. Jordan is strong, has good hands, uses the glass well, has range, works hard to get position, and pays attention to details. She will be a smart and physical presence for our program."

Jordan comes by her talents honestly as her mother Freda Tippeconnie is a former collegiate basketball player at Rose State College and East Central University. At a height approaching 6'1 with an athletic build, Jordan is a commanding presence at the high school level. With a skill set equal to her stature, she will undoubtedly continue her present success as Oklahoma Christian's first women's basketball signee since the school's transition from NAIA to NCAA Division II athletics. During a recent conversation she told me how grateful she was for the opportunity to play at the collegiate level and that anyone looking to play at the college level needs to work hard all the time as "you never know who is watching". She went on further to acknowledge that when she steps out on the court she is not only playing for her school, her team, her family, and herself, but for her tribes and for Indian Country.

Jordan has been presented with basketball as a platform to represent her people and further develop herself as a role model for other Indian girls and young women. Of course, there is still the matter of one final high school basketball season hopefully culminating in a last run at a state championship. In speaking with her, one finds she is well on her way in both regards.

Just ask Senator-elect Elizabeth Warren

TIM GIAGO (Nanwica Kciji) © 2012 Unity South Dakota

Native Americans fit nicely into that media box labeled "Out of sight; out of mind:" And if not out of sight, then badly portrayed.

At Thanksgiving white and black school children sporting cardboard headbands and feathers whoop and holler like "wild Indians" around their classroom desks. This past Thanksgiving I saw a cartoon of the first Thanksgiving with Indians dressed in the attire of the Indians of the Northern Plains replete with feathered ceremonial bonnets. That's the portrait of all Indians; it is the misconception painted into the minds of school children since colonial times: All Indians look and dress alike.

Tourists from back East come out West to see the Indians attired in buckskin and presumably still living in teepees, and this would make for a great tourist attraction except the city fathers of communities like Rapid City do not have the vaguest of ideas that this is what the tourists come out here to see. They still think that Mount Rushmore is the key attraction.

Indians are either the noble savage or the downtrodden, pathetic, alcohol soaked loser. To the weeping liberal, Indians are static relics locked into a time frame that would deny them the progress accorded to all other Americans: If they cannot be immediately identified as Indian they are not; just ask Senator-elect Elizabeth Warren.

There are more federal agencies regulating Indians than any other ethnic group in America. Lands on Indian reservations are held "in trust" by the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the main problem with that condition is the Indians are expected to provide all of the trust. The recent Cobell Settlement is a classic example of that because the government's total mismanagement of Indian lands, mineral rights, grazing rights, natural resources and financial security were so badly accounted for that the Indians lost untold billions of dollars.

The Cobell Settlement was a pittance in remuneration because the accountability of the agencies holding Indian properties, etc., in trust was so jumbled with distortions and cover-ups that the true accounting of the theft of Indian monies was indeterminable. The pittance individual Indians will receive in cash payments prior to Christmas should be a mark of shame on the history of America itself. Where was the national media in uncovering this mess?

What makes the Settlement even more unbelievable is that more than $1 billion was given back to the BIA to clear up the fractionated land conditions existing on nearly all Indian reservations, a problem created by the BIA itself. Yeah, let's take a billion dollars from the poor individual Indians and give it back to the idiots who caused the problem to correct their incompetency. What a travesty! And who is to blame the poor Indians for accepting the conditions of this travesty because after all, something is better than nothing and that is all the Indians ever expected from the United States of America: Nothing!

The biggest non-story to the national media concerns the Black Hills Claims Settlement. The $105 million for the Black Hills and the $44 million for other lands owned by the Great Sioux Nation have been refused by the Indian tribes of South Dakota since 1981 and during that time the original award, held in trust (there's that word again) has steadily climbed with interest to about $1 billion, and yet the people declared to be the poorest in America by the 1980 U.S. Census, refuses to accept the money. In any journalist's book that should be one of the stories of the century and yet, have you even heard about it?

Whenever I am contacted by a news reporter coming out here to do the "great American Indian story" I tell them about the Black Hills Claim Settlement. They totally ignore this story and head straight for Whiteclay, Nebraska to do a story about all of the beer sold to the Indians of the bordering Pine Ridge Indian Reservation.

I love Dianne Sawyer, but when she came out here to do her "great" Indian story for ABC Television news she and her camera crew headed straight for Whiteclay. When she interviewed the Pine Ridge chief of police she was told that 80 percent of the arrests his police force makes are alcohol related. Doing her standup Dianne looked directly into the camera and said, "Eighty percent of the people living on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation are alcoholics." That is not what the chief of police said and she knew it. It did, however, put a little bit more of the shock factor into her reporting; truth and the Indians be damned.

In 1960 President John F. Kennedy said, "Of all Americans, the American Indian is the least understood and the most misunderstood," and today's media does nothing to alleviate that truth.

While growing up on an Indian reservation I was taught that America was strong because of its diversity and integrity. Like most Indians, I had to learn outside of the classroom that this was a bit of a farce. Native Americans do not have the same heroes as most Americans. We do not honor the Statue of Liberty and we still believe that Mount Rushmore is the Shrine of Hypocrisy and all one has to do is to study the negative impact all of the four faces on the mountain had on Native Americans to know why that is so. Columbus Day is a day of tragedy to Indians and the thundering defeat of George Armstrong Custer and the 7th U. S. Cavalry at the Little Bighorn is a day to rejoice.

Out of sight; out of mind is really America's loss and tragedy.

Tim Giago, an Oglala Lakota, was born and raised on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. He was the founder and first presidentofthe Native American Journalists Association, a Nieman Fellow at Harvard, and he was inducted into the South Dakota Newspaper Hall of Fame in 2007.

Native character lead in popular video game

Noah Watts, a citizen of the Crow Tribe, portrays Connor, a half British, half Mohawk assassin in Assassin's Creed III.

SUSAN OLP The Billings Gazette

BILLINGS, Mont. (AP) – Noah Watts, a child of the '80s, grew up playing video games such as Pong and Mario Brothers.

Watts, a citizen of the Crow Tribe, also in his youth attended Crow Fair every summer, gathering with family to dance at the powwow, ride in the parade and take in the rodeo.

The two interests came together in his late 20s, when Watts snagged the role of the lead character in one of this fall's best-selling video games, "Assassin's Creed III."

Watts portrays Connor, a half-British, half-Mohawk Indian assassin (Indian name Ratonhnhaké:ton) in the time of the Revolutionary War. As with past versions of the games, the crux of the plot is Assassins vs. Templars.

The Ubisoft-produced game is a rarity in giving a Native American character the lead role. It was released Oct. 30 and, on one software chart, already is listed at No. 5 globally for sales

Watts, an actor and musician who lives in Los Angeles, was born in Livingston and grew up in Bozeman. Like the protagonist in "Assassin's Creed III," Watts comes from a blended background. His mother is Crow and a descendent of the Blackfeet Tribe, while his father's side of the family is Scottish and English.

"I believe that's one of the main reasons I was appealing to (the game's creators) because my heritage was very similar," he said in a telephone interview

He remembers his trips to Crow Agency every year, visiting family, taking part in the events at Crow Fair. A traditional Crow war dancer, he competed in the powwow and rode horseback in the morning parades.

He loved it all.

"Just seeing all the tepees, seeing my relatives riding around on horses, all the food," he said. "Just being around it was special for me." Watts' interest in acting also goes back to his childhood. He took part in plays all through school.

In high school, he participated in speech and debate, rotating between serious and humorous pieces. In his senior year, in 2001, he took fourth place at the National Forensic had just completed work in five shows of the TV series "Ringer" late summer 2011 when he got a call from his manager.

Watts had an audition for a part in an unnamed film.

"It was a period piece set in the American Revolution," he said. "I the helmet and placed 4 to 6 inches in front of his face, to film his facial expressions.

He strove to make his movements convey Connor's character.

"Shoulders hunched and head down is different than head up, shoulders back," Watts said. "It gives captured "a more complete version of the character instead of a hybrid of a bunch of different people," he said.

He's played the completed "Assassin's Creed III" with a different point of view from the earlier "Assassin's Creed" games.

"It's very interesting to hear myself

"Connor" is a half British, half Mohawk assassin during the time of the U.S. Revolutionary War.

League's national meet for a dramatic solo piece.

The next year, he worked on two films, "The Slaughter Rule," which starred Ryan Gosling, and "Skins." He knew then that acting was his passion.

"All signs pointed to Los Angeles and being an actor and a musician," he said.

Watts attended the American Academy for the Dramatic Arts in Los Angeles for a semester, but when he got the chance to act in another movie, a mystery titled "Skinwalkers," he jumped at it.

He has learned a lot on movie sets, he said, and he has worked with an acting coach to refine his craft.

He did film, TV and theater and had no idea it was a video game until I got offered the part."

Not only was Watts familiar with "Assassin's Creed," he was a fan of the games, having beaten each one in the series

He began work on "Assassin's Creed III" in January, traveling to Montreal for a couple of weeks at a time. He'd return to Los Angeles and then go back to Quebec, as needed, until he finished this fall.

On the set, Watts would don a sort of skin-tight wet suit. Reflective motion tracking sensors attached at his hips, knees, feet, hands, shoulders and back captured his motions.

Watts also wore a helmet cam, with custom-made motion sensors on the top and a camera hooked to a different attitude to the person. I tried to bring that to the role, that type of aura."

He also had to speak Mohawk, which he did with a consultant sitting next to him in the studio. He'd speak the lines "over and over till I got it right."

He didn't do his own stunts. As in most movies, that work was left to a stuntman.

In the past, Watts said, one actor would do the voice and another the motion capture. As a game player, Watts found that jarring.

"It looked kind of weird," he said.
"With the voice of somebody on somebodyelse's body. Subconsciously, your brain notices it."

This way, the game makers throughout the game," he said. "The story is rich, and the interaction with the other characters reminds me of certain times on the set."

Watts wouldn't mind doing more voiceover motion capture. He's also working on other TV and film projects.

As for portraying a Native American in such a public platform, Watts is glad for the opportunity.

"For the first time, we're allowed to step into the shoes of a Native and look at it from his viewpoint," he said. "I'm excited. I love it. It's something we've needed to do for a long time."

FILM

says so to Ross Swimmer, the tribe's principal chief from 1975-85. The film then recounts the efforts she made to gain the trust of residents in the small community of Bell, a rural outpost in the hilly country of Adair County. There, residents are unable to qualify for housing assistance because the area does not have water service. The lack of suitable housing, in turn, prevents them from qualifying for grant money to bring water into the hills.

Tasked by the chief with finding a solution, Mankiller goes to the residents of Bell and anyone within the tribe who will help bring water to even the most isolated pockets of the Cherokee Nation.

That's where Soap (played by Oglala Lakota actor Moses Brings Plenty) enters the picture and helps a spirited Mankiller speak with families and elders (often translating into Cherokee for them) about building a water line that could save the small community's school building and bring water to residents. The residents are soon convinced that the project will only be complete if they volunteer their own time to install it.

A little thing called "gadugi" helped, too, said Soap.

"Gadugi" is the Cherokee word for when people come together to take care of one another and see the job through to the end, he said. The Cherokee people of Bell, with help from Mankiller and Soap, brought water to their homes for themselves as well as their non-Native neighbors. The Bell Project, as it was called, was the first of several water projects made possible between the nation and resident volunteers who endeavored to make opportunity happen for their selves. Mankiller soon was elected as the tribe's deputy chief. When Swimmer was appointed to assistant secretary of the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs, she became the Cherokee's first woman Principal Chief, leading the tribe from 1985-1995. Mankiller died in 2010 of pancreatic cancer.

The Cherokee Word for Water shows how Soap and Mankiller became allies, friends and something more. He said it also reveals Mankiller's tenacity and ability to inspire and empower the people she

"To me that was the greatest impact it had on these communities," Soap said. "Also we worked with them and taught to write grants, taught them to conduct meetings, taught them about writing proposals to be self sufficient so they would not have to depend on Cherokee Nation or the government not a hand out. It instills pride in Indian communities. The whole idea was to make them independent."

Soap served as a film producer and shared directing responsibilities with screenwriter Timothy Kelly. He joked that blasting through rock to install the 16-mile water line was a simpler task.

"I think getting water to Bell was a lot easier than making the film," Soan said Mankiller worked on the film for years with long-time friend Kristina Kiehl to tell the story of the Bell people and their feat. A week before her passing, she made Soap promise to raise money to finish the film and help Kiehl.

"I told her, 'I'm not a fundraiser, Wilma," he said. "She said, 'I don't want to hear that, Charlie. I just need it done."

Kiehl, who met Mankiller during her first election campaign for principal chief, is also a producer on the film. They became close friends.

"This is a story of hope and resilience," Kiehl said. "She felt it would resonate beyond Indian Country to people everywhere. She said it was her hope that people who were living in depressed communities would see this film and would say, 'If they can do it, we can do it."

Most of the movie was filmed last fall before it went into post-production for editing, sound, captions and many other processes before it could be distributed. The film was cast almost entirely of American Indians, many of whom are Cherokees. Indigenous rights activist Oren Lyons (Onondaga, Seneca) played the role of Soap's grandfather.

"It was fun having been invited (to participate). I'm not an actor ... but knowing Wilma for so long and Charlie, when he asked me if I wanted to play the part of the grandpa, I said, 'Sure.' That was fun."

Kiehl said they had tremendous support in talent, time and funds from local communities, area organizations and film professionals to make The Cherokee Word for Water. And, with the help of the Wilma Mankiller Foundation, created six weeks after her death, the film will be a tool for empowering people everywhere to make the changes they want to see.

Their promise fulfilled, both Kiehl and Soap said they are glad Mankiller's legacy can be shared further.

The movie will be shown at Circle Cinema (www.circlecinema.org) in Tulsa and the Dream Theatre in Tahlequah through Dec. 6. Go to www.cw4w.com for showing schedule and more about the film.

Spending cuts shadow Obama meeting with tribes

SUZANNE GAMBOA Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – Hours after talking tough against Republicans in "fiscal cliff" negotiations, President Barack Obama and members of his Cabinet reassured hundreds of Native American leaders the administration's programs and efforts on their behalf would continue.

Obama ticked off a list of achievements by his administration on behalf of Native Americans and then spoke of improving America's roads and its infrastructure and expanding Native American small businesses.

"I've never been more hopeful about our chances," Obama said in a Wednesday afternoon speech to hundreds of Native American tribal leaders.

Earlier in the day, Obama had admonished congressional Republicans over their threat to agree to higher taxes and then seek spending cuts in the next debate over the government's borrowing limit

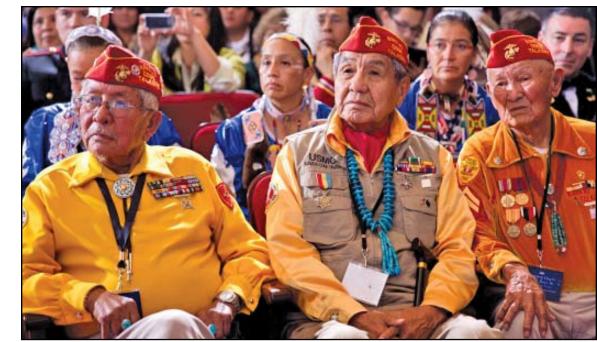

"It's not a game I will play," Obama said at a speech to the Business Roundtable.

Obama did not discuss the fiscal cliff negotiations at the tribal summit, but more than 500 tribal leaders took their concerns about spending cuts that could go into effect to avoid the fiscal cliff to the summit.

Eight Cabinet members, led by Interior Secretary Ken Salazar, addressed the leaders and other agency officials met with tribe leaders in closed meetings in a mid-day break.

The gathering "should send a loud and clear message to everyone that Barack Obama understands the importance of Indian Country and is committed to making sure we continue to make progress," Salazar said.

Agreement boosts access for American Indian vets

WASHINGTON (AP) – Native American military veterans will be able to access health care closer to home thanks to an agreement between the U.S. Department of Veteran Affairs and the Indian Health Service.

The agreement allows for Veterans Affairs to reimburse IHS for direct health care services provided to eligible American Indian and Alaska Native veterans.

Health and Human Services Secretary Kathleen Sebelius first announced plans for the new partnership during last Wednesday's tribal summit.

Veterans Affairs and IHS released more details Dec. 6, saying the agreement stemmed from much work among the agencies and tribal governments as they tried to find a more equitable solution for bolstering access to care for veterans, particularly those in rural areas.

Secretary of Veterans Affairs Eric Shinseki says the VA is committed to expanding access to Native veterans "with the full range of VA programs, as earned by their service to our nation."

Muscogee (Creek) Nation to file civil action against Poarch Band

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON
Native American Times

OKMULGEE, Okla. – A recent decision by an Oklahoma tribe to pursue litigation against another tribe is apparently not without precedent.

Ata Nov. 29 emergency meeting of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation National Council, the tribe's legislature voted unanimously to authorize Brendan Ludwick and an Alabama law firm to file a civil action in federal court on behalf of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation against the Poarch Band of Creek Indians, headquartered in Atmore, Ala., its contractors, vendors and other individuals who have worked with the tribe on excavation and exhumation brought on by casino expansion efforts. The project could potentially desecrate Hickory Ground, a burial site, ceremonial ground and the last pre-removal capitol of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation.

To date, 57 sets of human remains have been unearthed during the expansion process, which wastemporarily suspended in October while leaders from the two tribes met three times at neutral sites to discuss the situation. Construction resumed Oct. 31, despite objections from the Oklahoma tribe.

Bill Rice, a professor at the University of Tulsa's Native American Law Center, said while such a move is unusual, it is not entirely unheard of.

"Sometimes tribes just have disputes that they want settled by a third party, such as the federal courts," he said. "The difficulty of course, is that the federal courts recognize the sovereign

Feds pledge to improve sacred site protection

WASHINGTON (AP) – Protection of sites held sacred by American Indians and Alaska Natives will be bolstered under a memorandum of understanding signed Thursday by four federal agencies and the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation.

The memo signed by the departments of Agriculture, Defense, Energy and Interior also calls for improving tribal access to sites that are on federal land.

"We have a special, shared responsibility to respect and foster American Indian and Alaska Native cultural and religious heritage, and today's agreement recognizes that important role," Interior Secretary Ken Salazar said in a statement.

The agencies plan to work during the next five years to raise awareness about sacred sites. That includes developing a website, a training program for federal employees and guidance for managing sacred sites.

The agreement comes just weeks after thieves made off with rock carvings from a sacred site in California's Sierra Nevada. The site on the Volcanic Tableland north of Bishop, Calif., was what land managers called one of the most significant rock art sites in the region. The local Paiute tribe uses the site for ceremonies.

President remembers Sonny Black Eagle

MATT COMPTON

WASHINGTON – Each year, President Obama hosts a White House Tribal Nations Conference in Washington, DC. The goal is to give leaders from America's federally-recognized tribes the opportunity to interact directly with members of the administration, including the President.

And while administration officials - including eight Cabinet members - discussed programs and initiatives that affect Native American communities Dec. 5, President Obama began his remarks with a more personal message.

He used the event to remember Sonny Black Eagle - the Crow National tribal leader who adopted the President in 2008. Black Eagle passed away in his sleep last month. He was 78.

The President celebrated what he called Sonny Black Eagle's "remarkable life."

After losing his mother to tuberculosis, Black Eagle was raised by his grandparents in Montana, who taught him both the traditions and the language of the Crow people. As a child, however, Black Eagle had to contend with teachers who would strike him for speaking Crow in school, and as a young man, he was confronted by racism and segregation.

"Sonny, like many of you, knew intolerance and knew injustice. He knew what it was like to be persecuted for who you are and what you believe," the President said. "But as time went by, year by year, decade by decade, as Native Americans rallied together and marched together, as students descended on Alcatraz and activists held their ground at Frank's Landing, as respect and appreciation for your unique heritage grew and a seminal struggle played itself out, Sonny lived to see something else. He saw a new beginning."

That new beginning took the shape of a different policy from the U.S. government -- one that allowed tribal governments to build out stronger institutions and Native Americans to embrace self-determination.

And in his four years in the White House, it's a policy on which President Obama has

Construction works continues on the concrete lining of the Southside canal on Nov. 16, 2012 in Sacaton, Ariz. The Gila River Indian Community is building a water delivery project to make use of their CAP allocation.

CAP water to help tribes restore farming heritage

SHAUN MCKINNON The Arizona Republic

SACATON, Ariz. (AP) - Workers scramble down an earthen section of the Southside Canal on the edge of the Gila River Reservation, smoothing a fresh concrete panel and readying the next segment for lining, a process that will save millions of gallons of water that once was lost to seepage.

The flow of water, halted temporarily to allow construction, will resume this month and much work remains. David DeJong, director of the community's irrigation project, checks what has been done, then moves on to another site near the far end of the channel. Timing is critical to ensure water for winter crops.

"For a long time, we were doing one project a year and a lot of people were saying, 'Oh, it'll never happen, it'll never get built," DeJong said. "Then we built a new canal segment along the highway, and suddenly people could see the work. Now they're clamoring for water."

The community has the water. In 2004, tribal leaders received the rights to more than 600,000 acre-feet a year, or enough to serve a city of 3 million people, in the largest Indian water settlement in U.S. history. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1908 that tribes with reservations were entitled to enough water to remain self-sufficient. The government has since settled claims with dozens of tribes.

Now leaders must find a way to use the water and, with none in the river that gives the reservation its name, the solution is the same as it has been in Arizona since the Hohokam built the first canals across what is now Phoenix.

By 2029, the Gila River community plans to build or refurbish at least 1,700 miles of canals to create a system that will irrigate more than 100,000 acres, transforming the dry desert into productive farmland. Some of the canals, like the Southside, have been in service for 80 years or more. Others will be excavated and added to the network.

A significant portion of the water from the settlement - 311,800 acre-feet, the equivalent of about 100

Tempe Town Lakes each year - will be delivered through the Central Arizona Project Canal. The waterway has been instrumental in settling more than a dozen Indian claims in Arizona, enough that tribes now control almost half of the water that flows through the canal each year.

The Gila River community surprised some in Arizona when it announced it would use almost all of its water for agriculture instead of leasing it to off-reservation cities. Tribal leaders say the decision was an important way to restore some of the heritage lost as the two tribes in the community, the Pima and the Maricopa, settled on the arid reservation. They also want to restore some of the Gila River itself, creating riparian areas that will remind people of their past and still connect them to the present.

"Finding ways to restore water and farming go hand in hand," said Gila River Gov. Gregory Mendoza. "The ancestral name of the Pimas is River People. Unfortunately, we don't have a real river anymore. Our goal here is to restore self-sufficiency and at least a small flow of the Gila." Not all Arizonans wanted to set aside so much water for tribal claims from a project, the CAP Canal, that had become a potent symbol of Arizona's potential to grow and prosper in the desert.

But state and federal officials had long agreed that the canal would provide water for Indian settlements. The federal government allocated water for tribal settlements as early as 1976, and the Interior Department added to the pool several times over the years, despite objections from within Arizona. Most of the settlements include federal aid for distribution systems.

"As a business decision, it probably wasn't a good one," said David Modeer, CAP's general manager. "When you factor in the legal aspects, the cultural aspects, the history, I think it was a right decision." Ample water remains for all CAP users, he said. The value of a consistent water supply like the CAP Canal is evident when other sources become unavailable. Tribal farmers can take water from the San Carlos Reservoir, which sits behind Coolidge Dam on the Gila River, but this year, the reservoir all but dried up and water deliveries were cut off in June.

The Gila River community can take water from other sources, including Salt River Project and several Valley cities that supply treated effluent, but CAP will become an increasingly important source as the irrigation project

In the meantime, the community finds itself in a situation not unfamiliar to Arizona water leaders in the early years of the Central Arizona Project. It holds the rights to more water than it can use.

Many in Arizona assumed that after Indian tribes received water in settlement deals, they would lease it to cities with long-term contracts as a way to make money.

Instead, the Gila River community will sell one-time water credits each year to cities or other big water users that need an immediate supply. It's like buying water at the supermarket instead of signing up for ongoing delivery, except in this case, the water will be stored underground until the city needs it. By doing it that way, the community can put the water to use, help its neighbors and use the money from the credits to pay for the irrigation systems. When tribal farmers need the water, the community will stop selling credits.

"It's a unique enterprise, one of those unexpected kinds of results after the settlement," said Rod Lewis, a tribal attorney who helped negotiate the water deal. "For us, the real question is what happens to the CAP water. Between now and 2029, we have the right to use the water, but we needed a way to store it and look out for our future."

The community partnered with Salt River Project to run the water credits program. In exchange, SRP will receive stored water for several of its power plants and a 20year option to use as much as 100,000 acre-feet of the community's CAP water in times of severe drought.

"It doesn't mean we're going to use it," said David Roberts, SRP's senior director for water-resource management. "But it's nice to have it."

The system will also help farmers, mostly in Pinal County. Once a water user buys a credit from the community, the water will be used to irrigate crops and a percentage of it - the amount that seeps into the earth – will be counted as groundwater under state law. The owner of the tribal water credit can then pump the water back out when needed.

As SRP worked with the community on the program, "it all fit," Roberts said. "It's not a supply for everything out there, but it could be a supply for 20 or 30 years of growth in some areas."

From the Olberg Bridge on Arizona 87, the Gila River channel is clearly visible, even though no water flows through it. For Gila River Lt. Gov. Stephen Lewis, the riverbed represents a chance to remind his people what they can do with water from the CAP Canal.

"Once they see a lot of the construction activity on the irrigation project, once they see firsthand what the water settlement means, that we're going to get our water back, it's palpable," he said. "The elders have seen through their lifetime the absence of water. Now they're seeing the water coming back."

Lewis has talked to community farmers, who say the wait was worth it, and he's also talked to young people who have never seen water in the Gila River.

"They have heard stories, and that has revived interest in farming," Lewis said. "They are so sophisticated already, talking agribusiness and science and organic farming. It's exciting to hear."

Rod Lewis, the tribal water attorney and the lieutenant governor's father, said the community may have to reconsider what it grows. Tribal farmers typically grow many of the same crops as other farms in the area.

"It's good to grow cotton and alfalfa," Rod Lewis said. "But maybe we should grow more food for our people."

Stephen Lewis said he hears the same refrain among young people on the reservation and he hears it more often as the water projects carve a path through the desert.

"We need to talk farm-totable," he said, "start growing fresh food. Feed our people. There are a lot of people who have never seen water in the river except in a storm or in black-and-white photos. We want to show them the transformative effects of water."

Okla. horse racing industry protests Creek deal

■ Muscogee (Creek) Nation Principal Chief George Tiger said the tribe's purse fund payments would cease with the end of live racing at Fair Meadows.

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

TULSA, Okla. - Despite an hour of comments and pleas from members of the horse racing industry, the Tulsa County Public Facilities Authority (TCPFA) unanimously approved an amended naming rights agreement with the Muscogee (Creek) Nation Thursday morning, ending live horse racing at Fair Meadows, a track located on the eastern edge of the fairgrounds.

"We have to consider the big picture and Tulsa County as a whole," authority member and Tulsa County Commissioner Fred Perry said. "We don't operate on a big profit margin here. Over the last six years, two of them operated at a loss. In 2011, we had a net income of $124,493.

"This agreement will have an immediate positive impact of about $240,000. As we drop liability insurance for the jockeys and other costs, that will increase our savings."

On Nov. 1, officials with the Muscogee (Creek) Nation announced the tribe had purchased the naming rights for the Expo Square at the Tulsa County Fairgrounds for $1.44 million through 2019. The original agreement, which was approved unanimously without comment by the TCPFA, included a provision that would end live horse racing at the fairgrounds

The amended agreement voted on Thursday dealt with the tribe's limited waiver of sovereign immunity on the matter, allowing the TCPFA to pursue

civil damages in a court of "competent jurisdiction" rather than restricting it to Oklahoma's Northern Federal district if the agreement is breached or

The agenda from the meeting in which the agreement was originally approved did not include any mention of the deal's provision to end live racing at Fair Meadows, prompting calls for a state investigation by Oklahoma Rep. Don Armes (R-Faxon), the Oklahoma Quarter Horse Racing Association and the Thoroughbred Racing Association

"We have been disappointed in the process by which the naming rights agreement was created and adopted by the board," Claremore attorney Mark Ramsey said to the authority members. "This meeting today is just window dressing. You have already made up your minds and now your are just trying to correct past errors and show some semblance of deliberation."

Ramsey, the legal counsel for the Oklahoma Quarter Horse Racing Association, said his client's next move is contingent upon the results of the state's investigation.

The offices of Gov. Mary Fallin and Oklahoma Attorney General Scott Pruitt have not commented on when or if the state's investigation will begin.

The agreement has also come under fire from horsemen across northeastern Oklahoma for its potential damage to their sport. Under the terms of a gaming compact enacted in 2005 after a statewide referendum, tribes with at least one gaming facility within 20 miles of a horse racing track are to contribute to the purse fund in exchange for track owners not installing gaming machines at their facilities.

Since 2005, the Muscogee (Creek) Nation has paid more than $7 million into the statewide fund, which is split among the state's three live racing tracks: Fair Meadows, Remington Park in Oklahoma City and Will Rogers Downs in Claremore, Okla.

Under the compact, Fair Meadows received at least $2 million annually from the Muscogee (Creek), Cherokee and Osage nations. On Tuesday, Muscogee (Creek) Nation Principal Chief George Tiger said the tribe's purse fund payments would cease with the end of live racing at Fair Meadows.

Tiger has also maintained that the tribe's interest in the Tulsa County fairgrounds is, first and foremost, with the naming rights for the Expo Center, which, come Jan. 1, 2013, will be the Muscogee (Creek) Nation Center.

"Whatever happens on the other side of the plate is not our fault," he said at an emergency meeting of the Muscogee (Creek) Nation National Counsel on Nov. 29. "The Tulsa County Fair Board had something that we were interested in and we went after it. That is all there Tiger and Second Chief Roger Barnett were not at Thursday's meeting. Tiger's legal counsel, Yonne Tiger, left during the comments portion and did not address the board.

Despite taking public comments, the board did not entertain any questions from the more than 75 people packed into the conference room at the fairgrounds' armory annex.

"I'm disappointed that you're not taking any questions," said Debbie Schauf, executive director of the Oklahoma Horse Racing Association. "It's pretty hard to have a dialogue without them."

Representatives from the horse racing industry have said they plan to continue their fight and will reach out to state and federal officials.

"You don't have the authority to excuse compact payments," Ramsey said to the authority members. "So you need to know that anything you do, we are going to ask Gov. Fallin to make it an issue with the National Indian Gaming Commission and go to arbitration if necessary."

Along with concerns about the end of live racing at Fair Meadows, some attendees also expressed worries about another portion of the authority's agreement with the Okmulgee-based

The tribe gets first right through 2015 to propose a new use for the old Drillers Stadium at the northeast corner of the fairgrounds. The former home of Tulsa's minor league baseball team, the stadium has not been used since the end of the 2009 season and any repurposing efforts would be subject to approval by the Tulsa County Fair Board. Officials with the Muscogee (Creek) Nation and Tulsa County have repeatedly said there are no plans to put in a casino at 15th and Yale, but a few area residents are skittish about their new neighbors and the potential tax implications from having triballyowned land in their backyard.

"I want to make sure you know who you are dealing with," Jim Ganaway said to the authority members. "You're dealing with a sovereign nation. That means the city, county and state officials don't have jurisdiction."

Idaho Supreme Court considers Native sold cigarette tax case

BOISE, Idaho (AP) – The Idaho Supreme border, the attorneys noted. Court is considering whether Native America American retailers must obtain Idaho state tax

The high court heard arguments Monday morning in the case between Native Wholesale Supply Co., which operates on the Seneca Reservation in New York, and Warpath Inc., which operates on the Coeur d'Alene reservation, the Spokesman-Review reported.

Native Wholesale Supply Co. has sold more than 100 million cigarettes to Warpath without complying with Idaho state laws that require payments into a fund created after a national tobacco settlement. The company imports the cigarettes from a Native-owned manufacturer

The state of Idaho sued the company and tried to fine it more than $214,000 because state officials said the cigarette sales didn't comply with Idaho law. But attorneys for Native Wholesale Supply Co. say the state doesn't have jurisdiction - the sales are between tribal members on reservation land - and besides. there's no evidence the cigarettes ever touched Idaho soil off of the reservation. The Coeur d'Alene Reservation touches the Washington

"Native Wholesale Supply has never sold to retailers that sell cigarettes to other Native any Idaho consumer," attorney Samuel Diddle told the justices. The wholesale sales to Warpath "may not be regulated by the state because of tribal sovereignty," he said.

> But Deputy Attorney General Brett DeLange told the justices that Idaho has a very comprehensive set of rules regulating cigarette sales, and one is that cigarettes must be approved for sale before they can be sold.

> "Native Wholesale Supply just wants to ignore all that. They don't want to comply with the state's efforts of comprehensively regulating cigarette sales in our state," he said.

> Retired Justice Linda Copple-Trout, who is sitting in the case, said there isn't a limitation on who ultimately ends up with the cigarettes, and that the state has an interest in enforcing its tobacco laws to help cover tobacco-related health care costs.

> Justice Joel Horton said his reading of Idaho's tax stamp law indicates it doesn't apply to reservation sales.

> "If they haven't made any sales of cigarettes subject to tax, they can't hold a permit," Horton

Treasurer resigns from Pawnee Council, seat open until May election

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON Native American Times

PAWNEE, Okla. - The Pawnee Business Council now has a vacant seat, but all signs point to it not being filled until PBC Treasurer Roy Weeks Taylor tendered his resignation Nov. 27, citing health and transportation issues. A Korean War veteran, Taylor ran unopposed for re-election in May 2011 after completing the unfinished term of former PBC Treasurer Linda Hand.

PBC secretary Linda Jestes will perform the duties as PBC treasurer until the tribe's next regularly scheduled general election on May 4, 2013.

Under Article 6, Section 7 of the tribe's constitution, if any PBC position becomes vacant within six months of a regularly scheduled election, then the special election for the rest of the open seat's term will be held concurrently with the regular election. Taylor's resignation comes five months and one week before the tribe's 2013 election.

Phone calls to Toni Hill, communications manager for the Pawnee Nation, were not returned.

Taylor could not be reached for comment.

The next regularly scheduled meeting of the Pawnee Business Council is Dec. 12 in the Roam Chief Building of the Pawnee Nation complex.

Report: State breaks Native child-protection laws

■ Native American children make up 13.8 percent of the child population in South Dakota, they make up on average 56.26 percent of youth in foster care in the state.

KRISTI EATON
Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) – South Dakota willfully has violated federal law by removing too many American Indian children from their homes and placing them in foster care with non-Indian families, the state's Indian Child Welfare Act directors said in a report they plan send to Congress.

Six of the state's nine directors representing each of the nine tribes in South Dakota met earlier this month on the Yankton Sioux Indian Reservation to approve the report that will be forwarded to Congress within the next few weeks.

The report is in response to a National Public Radio series last year that said the state routinely broke the Indian Child Welfare Act and disrupted the lives of hundreds of Native American families each year. Federal law requires that Native American children removed from homes be placed with relatives or put in foster care with other Native American families except in unusual circumstances. After the series aired, six members of Congress wrote to Indian Affairs at the Department of the Interior asking whether the NPR report was accurate and, if so, what the Bureau of Indian Affairs plans to Federal officials said a summit would be held in South Dakota in the summer of 2012 to address concerns raised in the series, but that summit has not taken place, so the Indian Child Welfare Act directors prepared their own report to send to lawmakers.

"South Dakota for well over a decade has systematically violated the spirit and the letter of the Indian Child Welfare Act," the directors wrote in the report. "The state appears to have done this willfully, and it may have done so at least partly to bring federal tax dollars into the state. ... We ICWA directors request that Congress put pressure on the BIA to host the summit on Native American foster care in South Dakota immediately."

A spokeswoman for the Interior Department's Office of Indian Affairs did not return phone and email messages seeking comment about the summit.

The federal Indian Child Welfare Act directors' report found that while Native American children make up 13.8 percent of the child population in South Dakota, they make up on average 56.26 percent of youth in foster care in the state. The report also found that as of July 2011, there were 440 Native American children in family-run foster homes in South Dakota. Only 59 of those children were placed in Native American foster homes while 39 Native American foster homes sat empty.

The report was prepared with the Lakota People's Law Project, a nonprofit law firm working to enforce the Indian Child Welfare Act in South Dakota.

"The point of the report is to stand in for the BIA. The BIA was supposed to provide an explicit assessment on the reporting that happened last year. The BIA did not do that," said Daniel Paul Nelson, secretary-treasurer for the Lakota People's Law Project. He added that a summit would not solve all the problems but would be one step to finding a solution.

The directors' report found that NPR's assertion that the state's motive for removing Native American children from their homes for financial gain is "complex." It found circumstantial evidence that state officials may take high numbers of Native American foster children in custody to stimulate South Dakota's economy because the state gets millions a year to subsidize foster care programs and receives additional money for every special needs child it adopts out.

The report did not offer suggestions on how to fix what the directors see as a problem, Nelson said, because they want to get all the stakeholders together to discuss the issues.

Tony Venhuizen, a spokesman for South Dakota Gov. Dennis Daugaard, reiterated that the Department of Social Services had "deep concerns" with the NPR report and said the Department of Social Services could not comment on the Indian Child Welfare Act directors' report because the agency had not seen it.

In the past, state officials acknowledgedthatadisproportionate number of Native American children are involved in the child welfare system, but said that is because they receive more referrals for alleged abuse involving Native American children, and that leads to more investigations and removals from homes for those children.

U.S. Chamber of Commerce targets Native-owned businesses with new initiative

LENZY KREHBIEL-BURTON
Native American Times

WASHINGTON – The U.S. Chamber of Commerce launched a new initiative Dec. 3 targeted at Native-owned businesses.

"The spirit of enterprise, entrepreneurship is thriving in Indian Country," said Rolf Lundgren, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's senior vice president of Congressional and public affairs. "Native Americans are a key part of our economic engine and they must navigate same uncertain waters as other members of the chamber."

Governed by a council with representatives from tribes and tribally-owned businesses, the initiative will advocate on behalf of tribes to foster a more conducive environment to conduct and launch businesses in Indian Country. Among the areas the initiative's partners plan to pursue in the upcoming Congressional session are energy development, environmental policies and potential foreign direct investment in Indian Country.

"The Chamber and Native groups have an opportunity to show how business should be done," Rep. Don Young (R-Alaska) said. "I believe this is a great step forward if you use it and don't just have meetings.

"You have the opportunity to get things done. Let's do this together."

Joel West Williams, a citizen of the Cherokee Nation and a member of the organization's governing council, said the new initiative stands to not only benefit Indian Country, but the United States as a whole

"We don't just employ Cherokees; we employ other tribal citizens and non-Native Oklahomans, plus people out of state," he said. "Our success in business has been a tie that has lifted all boats. As we've seen success in Oklahoma, we've seen success in other states as well. We're looking forward to working together."

Reps. ask feds about SD Indian foster care summit

KRISTI EATON
Associated Press

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) – Two Democratic congressmen sent a letter Friday to the head of the U.S. Department of Interior's Office of Indian Affairs questioning why the government has not yet held a summit about Native American children in foster care in South Dakota.

Reps. Ed Markey of Massachusetts and Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico wrote to Assistant Secretary of Indian Affairs Kevin Washburn asking about the agency's failure to hold a summit examining South Dakota's foster care system and the Indian Child Welfare Act. The federal law requires that Native American children removed from homes be placed with relatives or put in foster care with other Native American families except in unusual circumstances

Federal officials had told members of Congress they would hold a summit with state, federal and tribal officials following a story by National Public Radio that said South Dakota routinely breaks the federal law by taking too many Native American children out of their homes.

"Fourteen months have passed since our initial inquiry and it appears that a summit, or stakeholder meeting of any kind, has yet to materialize," wrote Markey, a ranking member of the Natural Resources Committee, which has jurisdiction over federal Indian affairs, and Lujan, a ranking member of the subcommittee on Indian and Alaska Native Affairs.

Phone messages to South Dakota's two senators and congresswoman were not returned late Friday.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs held an informal meeting on the Crow Creek Indian Reservation in March, but several state officials – including representatives from the Department of Social Services, which handles foster and adoption services – didn't attend.

"It certainly wasn't the summit the BIA promised," said Daniel Paul Nelson, secretary-treasurer of the Lakota People's Law Project, a nonprofit law firm working to enforce the Indian Child Welfare Act in South Dakota.

Nedra Darling, a spokeswoman for the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Indian Affairs, said in a statement that the BIA supports the ongoing tribal efforts to resolve the matter and the agency is ready to participate in future forums.

The NPR report said that 90 percent of the Native American children removed from their homes in South Dakota each year are sent to foster care in non-Native American homes or group homes, and that Native American children are placed in South Dakota's foster care system at a disproportionate rate than other children.

The report also suggested that the state's motive for removing Native American children from their home might be for financial reasons, because the state receives money for each child removed from his or her home.

The NPR piece was found credible in a report recently approved by six of the nine Indian Child Welfare Act directors representing each of the nine tribes in South Dakota.

The directors' report found circumstantial evidence that state officials may take high numbers of Native American foster children into custody to stimulate South Dakota's economy, because the state gets millions of dollars a year to subsidize foster care programs. The state also receives additional money for every special needs child who is adopted. The directors plan to send the report to Congress soon

State officials have acknowledged that a disproportionate number of Native American children are involved in the child welfare system. But they said that is because they receive more referrals for alleged abuse involving Native American children, and that leads to more investigations and removals from homes for those children.

"We've focused on justice and tribal sovereignty," the President said. "Long-standing legal disputes, like the Cobell case, have been resolved. I signed into law the Tribal Law and Order Act, which is helping to fight crime. These are all important steps. But we've got more to do. With domestic violence so prevalent on reservations, we're pushing Congress to restore your power to bring to justice anyone -- Indian or non-Indian -- who hurts a woman. With some tribal nations unable to put their land into federal trust, we're pushing Congress to pass the Carcieri fix right away."

Much of this work is ongoing, but it's an effort that President Obama has pledged to continue.

"Over the next four years, as long as I have the privilege of serving as your President, we're going to keep working together to make sure that the promise of America is fully realized for every Native American," he said.

Leader praises Tribal Nations conference

KRISTOPHER RIVERA Scripps Howard Foundation

WASHINGTON - Native American leaders from across the country met with government officials Wednesday at the 2012 White House Tribal Nations Conference.

"Today, because we make our conversations have translated into action, we can point to signs of progress," Obama said at the conference. He mentioned the longstanding Cobell case, in which Eloise Cobell, from the Black Feet Nation of Montana, sued the federal government for mismanaging money from Indian trust assets. The case, a longstanding point of contention between tribal governments and the U.S., was settled in 2009 for $3.4 billion. The tribes are set to begin receiving payments this month.

Native Americans and homosexuality

TIM GIAGO (Nanwica Kciji) © 2012 Unity South Dakota

Can the government refuse marriage and federal benefits to gays and lesbians? Those are the questions before SCOTUS (Supreme Court of the United States). They should make a ruling in June, 2013.

In the New York case the survivor of a same-sex marriage is challenging the justices to decide whether the federal government can deny legally married samesex couples the benefits that go with marriage. For most married couples the benefits of filing joint tax returns and receiving survivors benefits from Social Security are a given; but for same-sex couples they are prohibited under the Defense of Marriage

Act (DOMA). There are currently 41 states where same-sex marriage is against the law. In California the voters placed Proposition 8 on the ballot and brought a halt to same-sex marriage. Attorneys Ted Olson and David Bois are challenging this law. They argue that marriage is a fundamental right and that by excluding gay couples from marriage the law denies them the equal protection of the law. Human nature does not curse of favor any one race of people. There have been homosexuals in every nation that has ever existed on this earth, that is with the possible exception of Iran where President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad stood at a podium not so very long ago and proclaimed that there are no homosexuals in Iran. He was greeted with raucous laughter for this understatement.

Among the Lakota, Dakota and Nakota tribes, homosexuals were called winkte (wink-tay). If you look the word up in the Lakota Dictionary, even in the "New Comprehensive Edition" the one compiled and edited by Eugene Buechel and Paul Manhart, both Catholic priests serving on the Indian boarding school missions in South Dakota, you will see that they were not able to separate their Catholic religion from the reality of the word.

Their dictionary translates winkte to mean; a hermaphrodite, a plant or animal having both male and female reproductive organs. These Jesuit priests and many who followed them to the Indian missions were too detached from the real world to face the facts about homosexuals and it maybe it's because there were so many among their own ranks. If the subject was ever broached with their Indian students I'm sure it was beaten to death as a mortal sin of the first order.

To speak of winkte's today in Indian country draws mixed emotions. There are those who accept it as a genuine occurrence among the Indian people and those who deny it. When I wrote about it several years ago the reactions were mixed. One very old friend of mine, now deceased, named Dr. Beatrice Medicine, a Standing Rock Hunkpapa, fiercely challenged my interpretation of the word. Medicine was one of those rare birds; an Indian anthropologist. She knew her history and she knew her

That's what happens when a culture has been all but destroyed by religion and modernity. All of the religious orders that came west to convert the Indians, religions from Catholics to Mormons, all had a variation of beliefs that saw nothing good about homosexuality. I have only the words of modern medicine or holy men and women to describe to me how gay and lesbians played a role in the ancient cultures of Native Americans. Even using the words Native American in this context is exasperating because there was no "America" in the early cultures and traditions of the indigenous people of the Western Hemisphere, hence no Native American.

To attempt to define gay and lesbian in today's Indian country is like trying to describe the colors in a shirt that has been left hanging on the clothes line in the hot sun for too many days. The color is all but gone and every effort to bring back that color creates a false image.

And so I will take the word of the modern medicine men and women who claim that homosexuality was a known and respected segment of the traditional Indian culture.

And like everything else in this society, the laws about to be enacted by SCOTUS will also have an impact upon the people of Indian country. I know many gays and lesbians that are Lakota, Navajo, Hopi, Choctaw, Ojibwe, or of many other tribes in America, Canada and Alaska. They also have fought fiercely for the right to be accepted and for the right of equal protection under the law.

The winkte, according to those medicine men and women who purport to know, were a respected segment of the Lakota culture and in fact were highly revered. They base their opinions upon the oral traditions of a people without a written language, but with an oral history proven to be factual time and again by modern historians.

It would be highly improbable for the SCOTUS to accommodate the oral history of Native Americans in their arguments, but then again, why not? After all, our culture is much older than that of all the newcomers to our shores and one to be respected and not feared.

Tim Giago, an Oglala Lakota, was born and raised on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. He was the founder and first president of the Native AmericanJournalists Association, a Nieman Fellow at Harvard, and he was inducted into the South Dakota Newspaper Hall of Fame in 2007.

MEETING

Kathleen Sebelius, Health and Human Services secretary, tried to reassure the tribes the administration is working to continue providing health care to them. With Navajo Code Talkers in the audience, she announced plans for Veterans Affairs to reimburse the Indian Health Service for treatment of Native American veterans.

Also in the morning session:

- Neal Wolin, deputy Treasury secretary, said his agency would release later in the day proposed guidance on taxing of income from tribal businesses and benefits such as housing, school clothes and burial aid that some tribes provide their members. Tribes have been insisting the assistance should be exempt under existing laws.

- Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsak announced a new agreement among several federal agencies to coordinate on land management regulations particularly as it relates to protecting sacred sites.

Tribal leaders have long pushed for better recognition of their status as sovereign nations and, by most accounts, the annual meetings on Obama's watch have led to improvements. But with Republicans and Democrats in a standoff over raising taxes and cutting spending, there is worry that those strides "will be set back when the first loose rock from the fiscal cliff comes tumbling down on Indian Country," said Jacqueline Pata, executive director of the National Congress of American Indians.

Two looming concerns, Pata said, are health care services and law enforcement. The tribal leaders were to hear later from the Justice Department.

The group's president, Jefferson Keel, reminded the government of its federal trust obligations to American Indian nations in a letter to congressional leadership that was endorsed by several tribes and Native American groups.

The summit follows intensified campaigns by some tribes and native groups to turn out Native American and Alaska Native voters as part of a multiracial, multiethnic coalition that helped Obama hold onto the Oval

People who identified themselves as American Indians made up 1 percent of the electorate in this year's election, about the same as 2008, according to national exit polls. American Indians and Alaska Natives are about 1.7 percent of the population.

Exit polls showed Obama carried 52 percent of the American Indian vote, compared with 46 percent for Republican challenger Mitt Romney, although the totals could vary either way by 7 points or more because of the small group of voters.

Major policy decisions aren't made at the annual gathering held at the Interior Department. But 566 American Indian and Alaska Native leaders were invited for the chance to meet with senior agency leaders and raise their concerns in what are considered nation-to-nation discussions.

The National Congress of American Indians estimates that programs for American Indians could be reduced by 20 percent or more below 2010 spending levels if Congress fails to come up with a deal and automatic cuts go into effect.

Santa Clara Pueblo Gov. Walter Dasheno has a slew of topics to raise, including education, health care and putting more Native Americans on the federal bench and in senior government positions.

Dasheno's northern New community of 2,800 residents wants to build a clinic within the next five years, but he is unsure whether changes to Medicare and Medicaid and the stalemate on spending and taxes in Congress could dash residents' hopes.

"Indian people have never been in the forefront of receiving an equitable share of funds," Dasheno said.

Kansas point guard, former Sequoyah star, Angel Goodrich inspires Native teens

JULIE HUBBARD Cherokee Nation Communications and STAFF REPORTS

TAHLEQUAH, Okla. -University of Kansas point guard and Cherokee Nation citizen Angel Goodrich is not only getting noticed by sports publications for her elite performance, but also by teens in her former high school.

The NCAA Division I player is gaining a reputation for overcoming injury to help lead her Kansas squad.

After Goodrich led her Sequoyah High School team to four straight state championship games and three title games, she joined the Kansas squad in 2008. She suffered a severe knee injury in her first two seasons that could've jeopardized her

"I'm not surprised by her success. She learned to lean on people and let people help her," Kansas women's basketball Head Coach Bonnie Henrickson said. "I thought she was special the first time I saw her. She has separated herself and made a name for herself as a phenomenal point guard."

The injuries helped Goodrich learn valuable lessons and served as motivation to get back on the court, Henrickson said.

"That's what pushes me. I know something can be taken away from me so quickly and easily," Goodrich, 22, said. "I feel like experiencing those injuries made me stronger

Goodrich stayed focused and worked to get back to the elite level status she experienced at Sequovah. This season Goodrich has been named to the Wade Watch list, as well as a preseason third team All-American by the Lindy's Sports publication, and honored as a preseason All Big XII by conference coaches. Goodrich also led the nation in assists per game last year and broke the conference record for assists in a season.

The individual statistics and team achievements have led to Cherokee teens following her career, some said. Sequoyah senior Courtney Jones, a point guard, said Goodrich's demeanor and ability to overcome obstacles is uplifting.

"I love how she wanted to go somewhere to make a difference, and that's what I want to do," Jones said. "She is a big role model for me."

Augusta Smith, a Sequoyah High School teacher who once taught Goodrich, said she knew Goodrich would one day inspire others.

"You sense it when you are around her," Smith said. "It's the Native pride in her that tells you that she will succeed. She has already made her mark, and she will continue to do that very thing."

Goodrich said perception is exactly what she wants to portray to the youth of the Cherokee Nation and teens in her former high

"I just want to be the person they look at and say how I didn't let anything get to me," Goodrich said. "I just want them to see the fight I have and not give up no matter what happens."

Goodrich was the top performer Dec. 6 during a heartbreaking 56-64 loss to the Arkansas Lady Razorbacks in Fayetteville. She posted 21 points, six assists and four

The Jayhawks rebounded 97-64 at home Dec. 9 against in-state rival Newman University.

The team has two roadtrips into Oklahoma coming up that give Goodrich's Tahlequah area fans an opportunity to watch her in her final season at Kansas. The Jayhawks have conference games against Oklahoma State University in Stillwater Jan. 8 and the University of Oklahoma in Norman on March 2.

The Jayhawks and Goodrich have posted an 8-1 record so far and have climbed to No. 17 in both the Associated Press and USA Today Coaches University of Kansas point guard and Cherokee citizen Angel Goodrich, right, plays the University of Nebraska during the 2011-12 season.

Noted Chickasaw performer Te Ata featured in new Bill Murray movie

DEBORAH LARGEChickasaw Nation Public Affairs

Mary "Te Ata" Thompson Fisher is a cultural icon for many Native Americans. Te Ata, an enrolled citizen of the Chickasaw Nation, was a master storyteller and entertainer who took her talent across the globe singing and dancing for presidents and kings.

One of those instances will be a key moment in a new Bill Murray movie, "Hyde Park on Hudson" which will be released December 7. The film centers on the historic 1939 meeting between President Franklin Roosevelt and King George and Queen Elizabeth of England at FDR's home in New York. It was during that meeting that Te Ata performed for the dignitaries, and also represented Native American culture to the world leaders.

Playing Te Ata is an actress with Choctaw and Japanese heritage, Kumiko Konishi.

Before getting the part, Konishi said she wasn't familiar with Te Ata. However, she soon began to research her and learned she was an important figure not only in Native American culture but to Americans and to women in general.

"What was kind of crazy in not knowing about her was how rounded she was in her accomplishments and as a person," Konishi said. "In that time, to have such an education and such a worldliness to be able to travel on her own, on her own accord to spread the word and educate people on our culture. I felt there was a beauty inside of her and a regalness. She had an energy that apparently emanated from wherever she went."

Konishi said that from what she later learned about Te Ata, she was a humble person but one who attracted attention to who she was and what she was performing.

"She was one of those which I thought was really nice to bring to the role."

In the film, Te Ata is seen dancing for FDR and the English royalty. While there isn't much film of Te Ata during those days, Konishi said she was able to see one silent movie of Te Ata which small one in the movie, she said she knows there is so much more to Te Ata that today's audience doesn't

"Hopefully, the film will pique their interest and ask 'Who was this woman?", she said. "I want people to know so many things as a person, especially during that time to go against the grain. She was versed in Shakespeare. She was on Broadway. She knew how to take advantage of the skills she had and to focus them on changing the mindset of people back then."

at that time," she said. "It is important to see that there are other significant people who had a very big influence on our Native people."

Konishi said she believed Te Ata saw this appearance as a great opportunity to tell the story of Native Americans. She had the world stage at that moment, and thought that since they would be looking at her anyway she might as well teach them something.

"It was like she wanted to show these people our culture, our dance, our music," she said.

Starring in the movie are Academy Award nominees Bill Murray and Laura Linney. The story centers on the meeting between the two world leaders. It marked the first visit of a reigning British monarch to America as Britain was facing imminent war with Germany. Seen through the eyes of "Daisy" (Linney), Franklin's neighbor and intimate, the weekend produced a special relationship between two great nations.

"Even being on the set felt very real," she said. "It took you back to that era."

Konoshi said she is very excited for the movie to come out and introduce a new generation to Te Ata – if even briefly.

"It's a big film and I've yet to see it myself, so I am very excited," she said. "There are some phenomenal actors in this film. It was great to be around them, who are all so well trained. It was a highlight for me as an actor just to be around them."

For more information about the film, and to watch a trailer, visit: http://focusfeatures.com/hyde_park_on_hudson.

people that when she walked into a room, people would turn their heads," the actress said of Te Ata. "And it's not just the fact that she was a beautiful woman. She had a presence about her. It was her strength, her poise, her education and her experience in life that emanated from her but in a very humble way she used as inspiration for her performance.

"Because we didn't have specifics of the type of things she did there, we focused more on the dancing," she said. "We knew that she often shared dances from different tribes... and that she wore traditional buckskin"

While Konishi's part is a

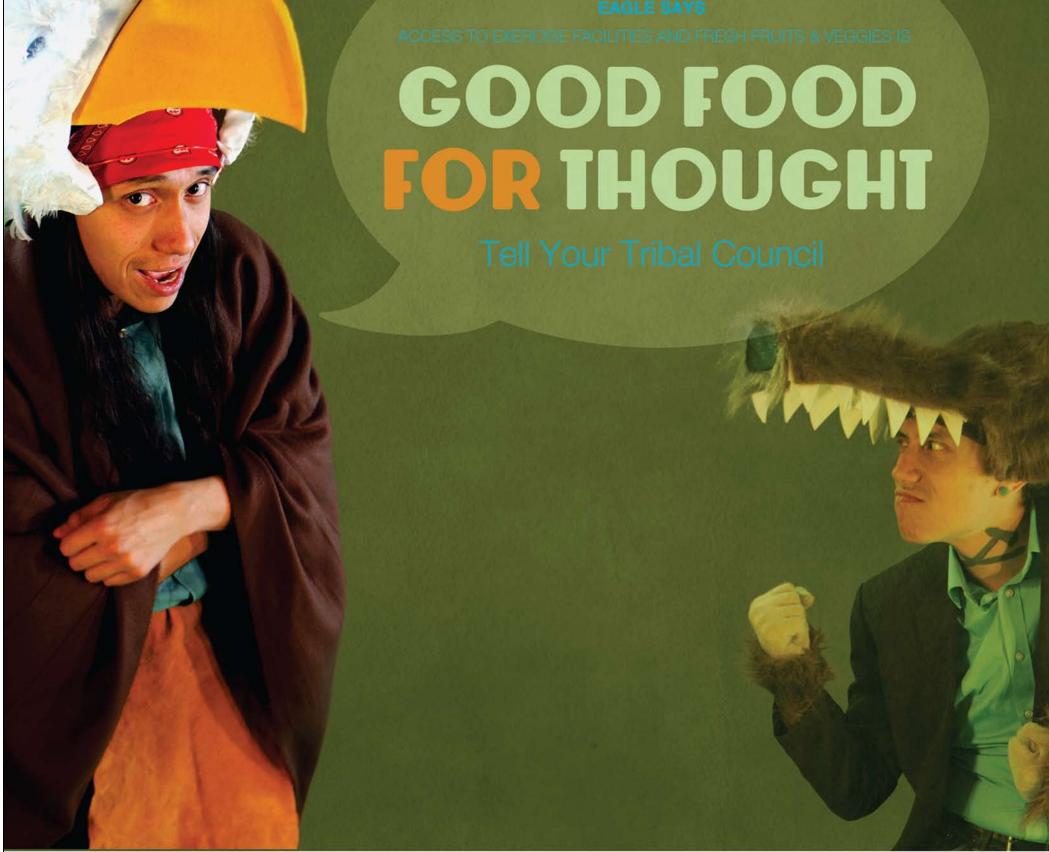

there was somebody besides Pocahontas in our culture."

Konishi said that anytime she tells people of her Native American heritage, the first response is that she would make a great Pocahontas.

"So, it is nice to show that there are other historical figures," she said. "Te Ata was an astounding woman. She did most people thought of Native Americans as depicted in western movie and being shown as "the savages who attack the white man."

At that time, Konishi said,

"She was trying to change people's viewpoints through entertainment because that was the only portrayal people were seeing of Native people
